A SIMPLE LIFE.

Is not one of the mistakes of civilization to be found in its tendency to concentrate so large a proportion of the population within the limits of great cities? The city, of course, is a needed adjunct of growth and development. It is largely the home of invention, of mechanical, educational and scientific advancement, and offers many advantages in certain directions of growth which may not be obtained elsewhere. But do we not undervalue, to a large degree, what the country has to offer as a help to the unfoldment of our mental powers and our higher moral and spiritual natures? What a vast untranslated volume do we find among the hills and in the woods, in the broad, wide plains, the rock-walled cañons, the groves and gardens, and the beautiful hill slopes that lead up gradually to mountain heights that seem to touch the stars. What melody there is in the song of countless birds; what beauty in the flying armies of butterflies; what glory in the flower-decked vales; what sweetness and balm in the unvitiated air, and what splendor of growth and unfoldment on every hand.

With nature's charms environing him, man more easily slips away from his little, narrow, sordid self-life into the largeness of universal being. Where can one realize the grandeur of the world about him so fully as upon some high hilltop, from which the eye can command such broad expanse of vision and such diversity of beauty? The infidel and the atheist are not born of the country. No creed of chance can be formulated there, for every bush and tree and flower, every hilltop and mountain height, every grass-covered plain, sun-flooded and beautiful, proclaim eternally the hand that formed them is divine.

The simplicity of country life is also favorable to the true development of character. The life of the city is too much given to luxury, and that saps the energy, the growth and the spiritual development of every people that is enslaved by it. As says a recent article in the San Francisco Examiner: "It is the simple life, and the simple life alone, that is able to save us. The simple life is the wise life. The simple life makes for health, for happiness, for great thoughts and great deeds. Luxury softens the muscles, weakens the will, corrupts the conscience, and winds up by making us imbeciles and degenerates. The moment a man reaches the stage where he thinks more of his dinner than of his duty, more of his coat than of his character, more of his so-called social standing than of his value as a man and a citizen, that moment he becomes an anarchist and is helping to overthrow the foundations of the State.

"The real greatness of a country is made up of those within its borders who lead lives of temperance; whose motto is 'plain living and high thinking;' whose grand business it is not to be amused and flattered and feasted, but to be doing something every day for the promotion of the larger and sounder civilization of the coming time. The men who founded this nation were thinking, not of menus, but of manhood; not of 'pink teas,' but of principles; not of riches, but of right; not of luxury, but of liberty—and we must think as they thought, or perish."

Let us not forget what a powerful agent country life may be made in working out this reform in our present-day civilization. Every true lover of nature will find it a marvelous text-book, full of wisdom that will not only turn his thoughts into nobler channels than mere commercialism and the study of profit and loss, but in the simpler life to be found there he will be made a better citizen through the daily contemplation of things better and higher than the mere life of rivalry and luxury which the city affords. Bear in mind the great truth, that "God made the country, but man made the town."

REMARKS BY MEN OF THE TIMES.

It becomes everybody to be good tomorrow, for such a day will not be seen again in four years.

As most of the troops that have been ordered to Panama are from Kentucky, it behooves Colombia to post up on the mortality figures of that State.

Venezuela is paying off those old debts that there was such a fuss made about, some time back. The country is also enjoying an era of prosperity. Bravo! little sister.

The wave of genuine patriotism sweeping over Russia not only puts to the blush the statement that internal hatreds threatened that country, but it also puts a quietus on Japan's strongest hope.

Notwithstanding the fact that the railway companies are held not to be liable for the death of a passenger riding on a free pass, the number of people willing to take the chances shows no sign of diminishing.

The largest searchlight in the world has been completed at Lowell, Mass., and will be used at the St. Louis World's Fair. Perhaps it may be employed to search for an honest member of the Missouri Legislature.

THE LARGEST MOOSE.

Probably the largest moose ever killed was shot in Alaska this summer by Lord Alphinstone and party in the Kenai Peninsula. This moose weighed 1576 pounds, and measured seven and one-half feet to the top of his shoulders. The skull and horns weighed seventy-five pounds, but the spread of the antlers is not known definitely. The next largest moose on the Coast is one in the Parliament Building at Victoria, B. C., which measures seven feet three inches in height. The party are very well satisfied with their hunt, and brought out quite a number of trophies, which they prize very highly. The English party was beaten to Seldovia by Baron Paul Neidick, who paid the agent of the steamer "Nome City" $1500 to be landed at Seldovia, where he could secure the services of John Gilpatrick, ahead of the English party. He won the race to the north, but the Alphinstone party got the game.—[Field and Stream.

The Labor Problem. By Frank G. Carpenter.

AS IT IS IN CHINA.

NEW CHINESE MINISTER TALKS OF TRADES UNIONS AND CAPITAL.

From Our Own Correspondent.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 20.—It was by appointment that I met Sir Chentung Liang-Cheng, the Chinese Minister, in the offices of his legation this afternoon. I had arranged by telephone for an interview with His Excellency, and our talk was held in a room furnished in modern style, the Minister sitting in a swivel-back office chair before a Grand Rapids roller-top desk. He was clad in Chinese costume, but he spoke in pure English and more like an American than like the representative of a nation which many think to be a thousand years behind the times.

An Up-to-Date Diplomat.

Sir Chentung-Liang-Cheng himself is by no means behind the times. He is an up-to-date modern diplomat, filled by education and experience to carry the world about in his big round celestial head, and to fight the diplomatic battles of his nation. He was born in China, but at the age of eleven was sent to the United States to be educated. He studied at Amherst for three years and then went to the Phillips Academy, at Andover, where he graduated.

Upon his return home he was taken into the employ of the government, which is another word for the old Empire Manager, and he has been in Her Majesty's employ ever since. He is said to be closely associated with Her Majesty, and it is probably due to her appreciation of him that he has been at the front in Chinese affairs for the past twenty years. He came here first as Secretary of the Legation, returned to China to take a place in the Foreign Office, and became one of the embassy which made the peace treaty with Japan at the close of the war.

Since then he has been connected with important missions to St. Petersburg, Berlin, London and Madrid, and has carried off honors from all these capitals. Queen Victoria made him a K. C. M. G., the Mikado gave him one of the most distinguished orders of his empire, the Czar of Russia did likewise, and so did King Leopold of Belgium. Amherst College has conferred upon him the title of doctor of laws, and all this notwithstanding he is still in his thirty-ninth year. What will he not be when he reaches the age when Li Hung Chang was greatest?

Money Matters in China.

I opened the interview by asking His Excellency about money matters in China. "I want you to tell me," said I, "something about your millionaires, your trusts and your combinations of employers."

"I am sorry to say that I cannot give you much along such lines," replied His Excellency, "for I have little to do with organized capital in my country."

"But you have organizations of capital," said I.

"Yes," was the reply, "but not such as you have in the United States. We have millionaires here and there, but the multi-millionaires are few. We have combinations of small capitalists, but no great trusts and syndicates, to monopolize our natural products such as iron and copper, sugar and fuel."

"What branches of industry are most organized?"

"The bankers," replied the Minister. "The bankers of my country come almost altogether from one province, that of Shansi, lying west of Shantung. That is a State of rich men, and those men make a business of banking. They have a natural aptitude for it. They might be called the Jews of China. They bring their sons up to be bankers, putting them into the counting-rooms when they are boys, and gradually raising them until they graduate as bankers. They go from there to all parts of the empire, and they are really the financiers of the country."

Banks Seldom Fail.

"Are they honest men?" I asked.

"I think so," replied the Chinese Minister. "They are honest and insist on their brothers being honest. If one of the bankers is about to fail, his brother bankers come in and lend him enough to save him from bankruptcy.

"There are many Shansi bankers in Peking. They had heavy deposits at the time of the siege, but when their banks burned down and a vast amount of paper money was destroyed, they did not allow their depositors to lose a cent. When the siege was over they called their debtors together and paid them in full."

Do Not Like Government Bonds.

"How about the government loans, Your Excellency, can they be floated at home?"

"Not easily at present," replied Sir Chentung Liang-Cheng. "Our people do not understand modern methods of national finance. They are rather afraid of government securities. For they remember that the government repudiated its obligations during the Ming dynasty."

"When was that, Your Excellency?"

"About 400 years ago," replied the Minister as though it were yesterday, and then went on:

"Indeed, I think it will be some time before the Chinese will invest largely in Chinese government bonds. Just before the war with Japan broke out, two of our most patriotic officials presented a plan for a domestic loan. There was no limit to the amount, but the bonds were to bear 5 per cent., and the government guaranteed the payment of principal and interest. A great deal of care was used in issuing the bonds, and they were labeled with a title which meant 'Emblem of Honesty.' Notwithstanding this, only about $14,000,000 worth of them were taken. These were distributed among the high officials, merchants and other rich people.

"Well, the interest was paid for a time, but after the war was over, the government found itself poor, and a great deal of money was needed to repair Peking and for other purposes. About that time a memorial was sent in to the throne, saying that its signers and the others who held the bonds felt a great sympathy for their country, and therefore had decided to give up their money as a present to the government, and they begged the Emperor to declare the bonds null and void. The matter was brought before the board of revenue, and the proposition was accepted. A great number of the bondholders were not consulted in the sending in of that petition. Nevertheless they lost their money, and as a result our people are not anxious for government securities."

"I suppose the men who made the application wanted to acquire merit or office for their generosity?"

"Very likely!" said the Minister. "Who knows?"

Guilds and Trades Unions.

"But you have employers' associations to regulate the relations of capital and labor, have you not?"

"Yes," replied the Minister. "We have such associations, but not especially to regulate labor. Many of the guilds are associated with the cities. The Canton merchants of Shanghai have a club, and the Ningpo merchants have one. There are also unions in almost every branch of trade, tea guilds, silk guilds and bankers' guilds. Such associations, however, have more to do with the prices, discounts and the handling of goods than with labor matters."

"How about organized labor? Does it exist in China?"

"We are not so advanced as you in that respect," replied the Minister. "There are many local labor organizations, but they are more like mutual life, sickness and accident insurance companies than your trades unions. Indeed, we have but few unions devoted to regulating hours and wages. There may be some at the treaty ports connected with the large factories. At Shanghai, for instance, the river for five miles is now lined with silk mills and cotton factories. There labor is somewhat organized, notwithstanding most of the employés are girls. They are always ready to strike, and do so when they think they are imposed upon. As factories increase in China, I suppose our labor will become organized and we shall have our unions and walking delegates."

"How about labor on the railroads?"

"It is not the quietest in the world," replied the Chinese Minister. "The workmen there strike every now and then. Just now there is a strike on the Hankow-Canton line which has stopped the construction."

How the Americans Lost a Gold Mine.

"That is on the concession granted to the American syndicate. How are the Americans handling their concession?"

"I don't think they are handling it very well," replied the Chinese Minister. "It would have been a gold mine if they had held on to it, but I understand that they have sold the control of the road for a comparatively small sum to Belgian capitalists. That concession was a most valuable one. It was given to the American syndicate largely in return for the great friendship which your country displayed toward China in the settlement of its difficulties with Japan. Different concessions in the way of loans and other things were made to Russia, Germany, France and England. The United States was the only nation which did not ask for anything and was at the same time about the most friendly to China. As a result, our people felt grateful, and we were glad to give your capitalists this concession with the authorization of a large loan to build the road and the privilege of having the profits of the sale of the bonds above ninety cents on the dollar. I can't conceive why the Americans did not hold on to it. As it is now, the Belgians have secured one of the most valuable railroad properties of China. They have a large interest in the line from Hankow to Peking and this extension gives them a great trunk line from Peking to Canton, tapping what is perhaps the richest agricultural and industrial district of the world, inhabited by several hundred million people. The road will pay from the start, and I regret that the Americans have allowed it to slip out of their hands."

"Are they working on it now, Your Excellency?"

"Yes. Work is going on at both ends and on both branches. Indeed when I go back home I hope to be able to travel from Canton to Peking by rail."

Chinese-American Trade.

"But there is plenty of money in China," said I. "Why do not your own people build railroads?"

"They will do so when they understand them better. We have many rich and well-to-do, and some are investing in banks and modern factories. Three-fourths of the shares of the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank are owned by Chinese. Our people, however, are slow to adopt new inventions and new things."

"How about the Chinese market and American trade?"

"Our market is an enormous one," replied Sir Chentung Liang-Cheng. "We are good spenders, and our trade will increase as we grow richer and as the country develops. It is already increasing as far as America is concerned. We are now taking about one-half of all the cotton cloth exported from the United States."

"Could the trade be further increased?"

"Yes. We have 400,000,000 people, and almost all wear cotton, winter and summer. In the future there will be a great demand for woolen goods, for they will take the place of much of the padded cotton now worn. There is also an increase in the use of American foodstuffs and luxuries. We are buying more of your flour every year and more tobacco and other things."

The Chinese Expulsion Law.

The conversation here turned to the Chinese in America, and I asked the Minister what he thought of our law as to the immigration of Chinese.

"I have but little objection to the law," said he. "But I do not like the spirit or manner in which it is executed. The law was made to exclude only Chinese laboring men from the United States, but it has been so construed as to keep out all Chinese, whether they come on business or on pleasure, as merchants, sightseers or students. I don't believe your government ever intended this, and I blame the treatment which our nation receives from the politicians, who wish to curry favor thereby with the laboring classes and make capital with them."

"Why, look at it," the Chinese Minister went on. "It is almost impossible for one of our boys to come to the United States for an education. Take the case of Mr. Tong, a relative of Tong, the graduate of Yale College whom you met in China some years ago. Young Tong's father is rich and he wanted his boy to come here to study. He took out the proper papers and sent him to San Francisco. When he arrived there the officers asked him what he wanted to do in the United States. He replied that he was anxious to learn English. They told him that there were colleges that taught English in China, and he could go back there and study the language. They refused to let him land. He hired an attorney and brought the matter before the courts. He spent more than $3000 in lawyers' fees and in going back and forth from China to the United States, but in the end they kept him out.

"Now his younger brother is here and in college. He came, with nine other Chinese boys, with me when I was sent here as Minister. He got in under the shadow of the legation, but he had a perfect right, under the treaty and the law, to come in, and his brother should also have been admitted. I know of many other instances where our boys who have wanted to study here have been kept out. Such things are contrary to the spirit of international friendship which exists between your nation and ours, and they are contrary to the best interests of the two nations.

"The same policy is adopted as to merchants and business men who are kept out on similar pretexts. The present treaty, under which these acts are performed, will expire this year. In making a new one I hope to have the matter remedied. If it cannot be remedied there is no use of putting any clause as to the admission of my people in the treaty, and if so I shall not advocate it."

The Chinese and the Philippines.

"How about the Chinese in the Philippines and Hawaii?"

"That is a business proposition for the United States to settle," replied the Chinese Minister. "I don't believe you can run your Pacific islands successfully without Chinese labor, and that is the belief of your ablest men who have investigated the situation. I came to this country with Mr. Ide, one of your commissioners. He told me that he thought the Chinese were a necessity to the prosperity of the Philippines."

"What is the new board of commerce, of which Wu Ting Fang is the head, doing?" I asked.

"It is trying to push Chinese trade everywhere," replied Sir Chentung Liang-Cheng. "I was anxious to further it in the United States, and I had written a memorial to the Emperor asking him to send me a commercial attaché, but before my letter got to China I received one from the board of commerce asking me to have our consular officers report on all matters relating to our American trade, and directing them to further that trade in every possible way."

"Do you send much to the United States?" I asked.

"Yes," replied the Minister. "We have now about 70,000 people here, and they all use Chinese goods. They want rice from China, shoes from China; they like Chinese cloths, Chinese tea and many other things Chinese. This trade has fallen off since the expulsion act was put in force, for we then had almost twice as many Chinese as we have now. Our merchants would like to see that trade increased, and they are also anxious to multiply their business connections in other ways.

"At present I do not think we are at all treated fairly, but just now we have had difficulties with other nations, and we are in no shape to insist upon our international rights. I hope that the day will come when we shall be able not only to demand them, but that in such a way that all the world will grant them."

With today lies all the treasure
That hast power to make thine own;
All the pledge of coming pleasure
His alone.

Precious gifts are in his keeping,
But this angel of thy fate,
If, perchance, he find thee sleeping,
Will not wait.

Upward from the gates of morning,
Onward to the realms of night,
Without pause or word of warning,
Swift his flight.

Not again his gifts he proffers;
Once for all he goes his way.
Seize the blessings that he offers;
Live today!

LOTTERY-RIDDEN LIMA.

AMERICAN ENTERPRISE AT WORK IN THE REPUBLIC.

From a Special Correspondent.

LIMA (Peru) Feb. 6.—This place is noted for pretty women, its scenic railway, and its fleas. The person who runs away from Guayaquil to escape the mosquitoes, comes on to Lima only to encounter fleas. It is merely another case of leaping from the frying pan into the fire. A stranger in Lima causes great excitement among the fleas. During the first few hours they explore his person so thoroughly that they leave tracks all over him. If the newcomer ventures on the street, he is besieged by another kind of pest—the vender of lottery tickets. Lima is as lottery-ridden as it is flea-ridden. Every time you pay your fare on the mule car you get a lottery ticket for change.

A Wonderful Railroad.

The railroad that climbs up the steep Andes from Lima is indeed a wonder. It cost more money than it will ever earn. It is known as the "Folly of Meiggs," that being the name of the plunger who put it through. Its construction cost so many millions that it broke the government of Peru, and put the country's paper money in the gutter. There are no bank notes in circulation here. The people have no faith in money that will not rattle. You cannot blame them when you learn that many of them have enough repudiated bank notes to paper the inside of their houses. But that railroad is a wonder, even if it did come high. In ninety miles there are fifty-four tunnels, thirteen switchbacks, two loops, and one of the highest bridges in the world. In 106 miles it climbs to an elevation of 15,600 feet, which is high enough to cause the average person's nose to bleed. The scenery along the route is simply grand, but the grade is too steep to make the hauling of freight profitable at rates in vogue in the States.

An American company is opening up what is said to be the largest deposit of silver and copper ore in the world. The famed Cerro de Pasco mine has been operated for 272 years, but always with indifferent success because of the crude methods practiced. Some idea of the enormity of the proposition may be had from the size of one of the excavations, which is 2500 feet long, 100 feet wide and 300 feet deep. The ore from this cut was carried out on the backs of men. The new company is engaged in constructing an extension of the railway to its property, and a smelter is being erected that will have a capacity of 1000 tons a day. The preparatory operations of this concern will cost many millions. They will probably build an entire new line of railway down to the coast, open a new port, and put on their line of steamers to the States. The company is made up of seven men who have their own capital, and who have no stock to offer the public. They claim that before they are through with the deal they will have the greatest foreign mining venture backed by Americans, both from the point of capital invested, and the earning power of the property. The man in charge of the field work at present says the Peruvian government has given them every encouragement and inducement, and that they depend absolutely upon it for the safety of their investment.

Daring Yankee Engineers.

The operations of the Yankee engineers are a source of constant wonder and bewilderment to the foreigners. The daring way in which the Americans blow up mountains that get in their way, or string bridges over seemingly impassable cañons, almost takes their breaths away. On one job a contractor used about $80,000 worth of powder in blasting. He employed 8000 men and completed a piece of work in less than three months that local authorities said could not be done inside of ten years. He put 3000 kegs of powder in one blast, and when the shot went off it tumbled over 700 trainloads of rock down a cliff into the river. There was such a mass of this débris that it raised the water of the stream fifty feet in less than twenty minutes. The channel had to be blasted out to let the water through. About fifty pounds of dynamite would be shoved into a place under a boulder the size of a box car. When the current was turned on the pieces from that boulder would go sailing over the hill like a flock of buzzards flying over a barn.

It takes nerve for a bridge builder to swing out over a cañon so deep that if he drops his monkey wrench it will take his helper a half day to bring it back. If a man should fall from such a height there would not be enough of him left to make a grease spot. An engineer gave me a photograph of forty-two mules straining at a boiler which weighed eighteen tons. This massive piece of machinery was moved eighteen miles over a mountain range where there wasn't the sign of a road. At one point it was moved only eighteen feet in two days. But eventually it went over. The record shows few failures when a start is once made.

Peddling the Scriptures.

The work of the agents of the American and British Bible societies in Peru is another story of patient and persevering effort which is meeting with success. These fellows are practically book agents selling to foreigners the scriptures printed in their own language. They had a hard row to to hoe when they opened up for business in Peru. This is a Catholic stronghold, and the situation is quite different from that in the United States. We have religious freedom, but here there is an agreement between the church and State that the latter shall embrace the Catholic religion, and protect it to the extent of prohibiting the public exercise of any other form of worship. This agreement constitutes the fourth article of the Peruvian Constitution. Of course, all Americans, Catholics and Protestants alike, believe in religious liberty, because they have been brought up in it, and it is only natural that the Catholics here, who have always had a monopoly, should resent the intrusion of their field and the trespass upon their legal rights.

When the book agents first came here they encountered some exciting times. Some of them were put in jail, and others had their literature taken away from them and burned. There was not a great deal of serious interference, however, for the reason that the influence of the free thinking Catholic element in America, was brought to bear on the situation, and the scripture-peddling missionaries were soon let out of jail. They went right on selling their Bibles. Last year they disposed of over 200,000 pieces of sacred literature in South America at the publishers' cost price. They figure that if a man pays for a Bible, he will take care of it, but that if it is given to him for nothing he may not value it as highly. The testament, the four gospels, the epistles, the psalms, and proverbs are printed separately in twelve different languages and in six different dialects.

The agents explain the teachings of the great book, and arouse interest in it, just as other book agents do, but they have to be careful not to hold open services. The government winks at their violation of the constitution, and as long as they do not put steeples on their missions, or ring bells for services, they are not molested in their work. They conduct their meetings just as a party is given in polite society in the United States—if you don't receive an invitation you are not expected, and if you don't bring your card with you, you can't get by the doorkeeper.

The President of Peru is a liberal man, and is really friendly with the Protestant missionaries. Only this month he accepted as a present a large Bible from the representative of the society, and on the day that this was written the local paper contained a notice about his having had his photograph taken with a group of missionaries.

It is an accepted fact in commercial matters that competition is the life of trade, and the same principle is true of religion. This is proven by the healthy growth of all religious sects in the United States. Where no restriction upon the practice of any faith, and where all creeds and denominations are all prosperous. This state of affairs in the United States, representing an advanced civilization, cannot help but influence less progressive nations in time. I am aware of the fact that in touching upon the subject of religion, I am treading a weighty topic. Much has been written on the question that would not be accepted by any side as fair. It is my aim to speak fairly of it. I am not concerned to thrash out the subject in favor of either Catholic or Protestant, but to report any feature of the subject that may appeal to me as interesting, and to make observations in a manner not hostile to either side.

Therefore, I may say that it seems the Protestants are going forward with this propaganda. They have ground in the face of the law. The men in charge, although they are Catholic born, are leaning toward liberal thinking, and are tolerant with the missionaries. What is to them a hostile faith. It is true that obstacles have been placed in the path of the missionaries, and that their course is not yet entirely clear, but they are trespassers according to the laws in which they are operating. For centuries the church has been pledged to uphold the Roman Catholic faith and to destroy all opposition to it. Apostles of other faiths cannot expect to come into this field with a welcome, but must shoulders and meet with a warm reception. Opposition means hostility in religion, business, love and everything else that has to do with human interest.

All this is said to show that the barriers put up against our missionaries are not unnatural ones. We have religious liberty, and these people have been living on another diet. We must not be impatient with them because they do not come over to our way of thinking in a day. They are really giving us a pretty fair chance in offering this lifelong belief in a different standard. The people are now showing tolerance, and they will even let down the bars altogether. It will not be many years before religious liberty will be an established fact in Peru. Events are moving to that end, and it will not be a bad thing for the country even from a Catholic point of view. It will broaden everybody and tone things up in general. The leaders of thought recognize this but do not want to precipitate in bringing about the change.

If foreigners come into the country to open up new resources, they will bring with them their religion, whatever it may be, and they will want to practice it. It will be according to modern ways of thinking, to allow them liberty in this matter. The Peruvians will see the point in this argument, and the Catholic church will see that the Protestants do not become too eager, and attempt to sweep the country off its feet by ramming their religion down the throats of their new neighbors, even if they move along toward the high plane of personal liberty now enjoyed in the United States.

It is a blessed privilege for every fellow to have his own to do as he pleases, and Peru and the rest of the South American countries will come out of the woods on the religious question if they are given their time for it. The best to do to try to halter them and jerk them out. If the persistant evangelists go along slowly, as they are doing, they will move surely on to their end. But if they abuse the privileges they have been given by trying to take a yard when they stir up a nasty muddle and the devil will have to pay.

Remarkable Photographs.

SCIENCE COMES TO THE AID OF THE FEMININE FANCY.

By a Special Contributor.

The prevailing craze of femininity for motifs in ornamentation—motifs on frocks, on wraps, on toques, on lingerie—has met with an unexpected encouragement in scientific circles. A prominent doctor of physics, a student of electricity has lately invented a method of producing such numbers and varieties in the designs of favorite motifs as to make the most fastidious heart supremely happy.

A new and interesting branch of photography, also, has been created by this discovery of M. Stephan Leduc, professor of biological physics at the Ecole de Medecine of Nantes, France, by means of which he takes photographs of beautiful and unusual designs of motifs by electrical discharge.

M. Leduc has won renown many times before this for the many valuable contributions he has made to the world of science of which he is a member, but none of his previous experiments have been accorded the recognition and prominence that was given this latest contribution to photography and electrical science.

It was at a late exposition of the Societé Francaise de Physique that Dr. Leduc presented several remarkable photographs produced by electrical discharges, different from anything of the kind that had ever been seen before. At first one would suppose that they were immensely magnified reproductions of the delicate forms of snowflakes, but closer inspection rejected this idea, for the designs were far more intricate and the lines forming them very much finer than snowflakes, and it was evident that a snowflake magnified to such a size would retain the fairy-like tracery of its outlines that are seen by the naked eye.

M. Leduc consented to explain, and the explanation was as simple as the designs were intricate.

"The object in making these photographs," he said, "is to direct the electric discharge on the sensitive plate so as to render it symmetrical and regular, in order that wide designs capable of furnishing motifs for ornamentation which could be indefinitely varied."

"In order to do this the sensitive plate must be thus prepared: In the darkroom, lighted with red light, a plate is coated with gelatino-bromide of silver is covered with pasteboard, from which previously the symmetrical design desired to be reproduced by the electric discharge has been cut out; the plate is sprinkled by means of a sieve with an insulating powder, such as starch, sulphur, calomel, zinc oxide or other powder of metallic salt. Then the pasteboard is removed; the cut-out design is reproduced on the sensitive surface of the powder, the remainder of this surface remaining clean and smooth.

The result may be varied not only by employing different designs, but by distributing over the sensitive surface pieces of tin, lead, copper, etc., cut variously. The powders give to the lines more or less firmness, according to their fineness and denseity; the most compact powders give the finest lines, and a great diversity in appearance may be obtained by employing different powders variously distributed by means of several pasteboard covers.

The plate coated with gelatino-bromide of silver thus prepared is placed with its non-sensitive side on a metallic leaf, but in communication with one of the poles of the generator of electricity.

On the sensitive surface, in the center of the symmetrical design formed by the powder, a metallic point is placed, which communicates with the other pole of the generator. The differences of the poles likewise contribute in varying the results.

In the operation thus conducted the plate coated with gelatino-bromide of silver represents the dielectric of a condenser, of which the leaf and the metallic point form the armatures. Only one discharge is reproduced; the plate is carefully dried with a dry cloth, so that no powder may be left, and is then developed in the usual way. That the result is always unforeseen makes these experiments quite fascinating. As a generator of electricity, either an induction coil or a static machine may be utilized, and the smallest generators are sufficient.

This is the very simple method which Dr. Leduc used in obtaining the exquisite results which he produced before the Societé Francaise de Physique—so simple that the veriest amateur in electric photography, with the necessary apparatus, which, however, is easily obtainable, could secure the same results.

It introduces a popular form of photography, for the fascinating uncertainty of the result and the wonderfully beautiful forms that are invariably developed by the method, make a new departure in what is truly artistic, at the same time calling for no special skill on the part of the operator, now that the way is shown to him.

Dr. Leduc has won the gratitude of not only the fair sex in inventing this easy means of obtaining unusual and intricate designs, but of the professional band of designers of all classes of work as well.

With the appearance of his electric photography the day of the kaleidoscope began to wane. How far more readily can designs be obtained from merely cutting a crude design in pasteboard and by a simple preparation securing a permanent and perfect picture of a motif, the delicate beauty of which is unexcelled, than by the old way of turning the kaleidoscope, and then going to much trouble, in which the necessity of a skilled hand is indispensable, to secure on paper the design which, while admittedly beautiful, according to the old idea, with all its intricacy does not stand in the same class of beauty with the motifs of Dr. Leduc's making.

But far more than to designers of oilcloths and wall papers, and weavers of carpets and hangings, is this discovery a boon to those who make the dainty laces that form so important a factor in the adornment of milady's beauty.

Ever on the lookout for something to add greater richness and loveliness to this favorite decoration of her garments, she welcomes enthusiastically the photographic innovation. The cobwebby delicacy of these designs is perfectly suited to this purpose.

"Why," exclaim the fair ones, "I never knew that so simple a design could be so exquisite and so out of the ordinary. There are no two alike, and, oh, think of the delight of having something entirely different from anything that has ever been made, and something that everyone else has not had."

Here is a motif so filmy that it seems scarcely real, and one would think that nothing could ever equal it, yet directly after it comes one that appears even more delicate and fairy-like; both of them are made up entirely of straight, fine lines, not a curve or an attempt at "fanciness" about them, and the feminine admirer exclaims rapturously that "they are perfect." God the All-Terrible, Thou who ordainest
Thunder Thy clarion and lightning Thy sword;
Show forth Thy pity on high where Thou reignest,
Give to us peace in our time, O Lord.

God the All-merciful, earth hath forsaken
Thy holy ways, and hath slighted Thy word;
Let not Thy wrath in its terror awaken,
Give to us peace in our time, O Lord.

God the Omnipotent, Mighty Avenger,
Watching invisible, judging unheard;
Save us in mercy, and save us in danger,
Give to us peace in our time, O Lord.

RUSSIAN SONG.

Hail, lovely land of Saint Vladimir!
Thy strength is vast, thy cities mighty;
Thou hast a host of faithful people!
On azure mountains firm thou leanest;
In azure seas thy feet thou bathest.
Thou dost not fear the cruel foe
But thou dost fear the wrath of God.

Hail, lovely land of Saint Vladimir!
My father's fathers gave thee service.
They won thee peace by fruitful reason,
Thy holy cities they embellished,
Thy cruel foes they helped to vanquish.
Recall the good deeds of my fathers,
They served thee with a faithful service,
And I with faithful heart have served thee.

Across the heavens the bright sun goes;
All the earth it warms, it lightens.
By night the crowded stars are shining,
And there is no counting the sand or the grass-blades,
And over the earth proceed the words of God—
It warms with life, with joy it shineth;
Bright gleam the churches' golden cupolas,
And the servants of the Lord and the pilgrims
Are countless like the grass-blades on the steppes,
Are countless like the sands upon the seashore.

NATIONAL HYMN OF JAPAN.

ODE TO FUJI-YAMA.

There on the border, where the land of Kai
Doth touch the frontier of Suruag's land,
A beauteous province stretched on either hand,
See Fuji-yama rear his head on high.

The clouds of heaven in reverent wonder pause;
Nor may the birds those giddy heights essay,
Where melt thy snow amid thy fires away,
Or thy fierce fires lie quenched beneath thy snows.

What name might fitly tell, what accents sing,
Thine awful godlike grandeur? 'Tis thy breast
That holdeth Nurusawa's flood at rest;
Thy side whence Fujikawa's waters spring.

Great Fuji-yama, towering to the sky!
A treasure art thou given to mortal man;
A God-protector watching o'er Japan;
On thee forever let me feast mine eye.

FAIR PLAY IN WAR.

"Forward! March!" was the next order, and off they tramped, the colonel at their head, until the field which they had despoiled of its fences was reached. "Halt!" the colonel commanded; and they sheepishly obeyed, having some time since begun to smell a good-sized rodent.

"Order arms!" and down went the rails to the ground. "Now, boys," said Wallace, "I want to say a few friendly words to you. It is one thing to spoil the enemy, and quite another to steal from a non-combatant. What Mr. Blank's private opinions are, I do not know, neither do I think it my business in the least; but he has never done the slightest thing to annoy us, I do know; to the contrary, we have received considerable kindness at the hands of his family, and only last week his wife sent a pitcher of fresh milk every morning to one of our boys who was sick. Now boys, replace those rails, and make that fence as good as it was before; if you make it somewhat better, I think the Union of the States will bear the strain, for the people of our country, both North and South, and all the bravest and best soldiers, believe in fair play."—[Margaret S. "Tourist Children."

THE TROUBLES THEY ENCOUNTER IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS HERE.

By a Special Contributor.

FROM Santa Barbara to Coronado it would be difficult to find a teacher of grammar grades in the public schools of the resort cities who has not an incident to relate of "tourist children" temporarily under their care. "Tourist children," be it known, are the blessed offspring of those who manage to spend the winter months in this Land of Summer, and are off and away as soon as the North and East again become bearable.

Southern California school boards are most generous to these youthful birds of passage. If there are vacant seats they are welcomed, even though they register from the most temporary hotel homes.

In and about Los Angeles, where the rapid growth of the cities has crowded the schools with the children of parents who are permanent residents, some have of necessity been turned away. The authorities argue that education as well as charity begins at home. At Santa Barbara, where the schools are not so crowded with "home" children, some of the rooms are more than one-third "tourist."

"If anyone thinks it is an easy matter to care for an inrush of twenty 'tourist children' from as many different States, prepared or unprepared by twenty different systems of teaching, and make them mix with thirty or forty California youngsters, they can substitute in my room for a day or two and become enlightened," said a Santa Barbara teacher the other day. "They want to do things as they did them in Ohio or New York or Indiana. There are studies which their mothers insist that they shall not take up and others that must be taught according to the mother's ideas or not at all. Some of the mothers are almost as unreasonable as the old school director over in Rincon country, who cannot write his own name, and who insists that his children be taught that the world is flat.

"Another difficulty arises from private-tutor methods of preparing children. They will be far advanced in certain studies, and know nothing about others of equal importance. For instance, there is one girl in my room who has never studied fractions. She is up in everything else, and the superintendent placed her where she is. I cannot turn back to enlighten her on three-fourths, two-sevenths and the like, and she may go through life without ever knowing the joy of struggling with fractions."

One tourist youngster in a Southern California school never walks up and down the aisle, but moves with a sliding run. Asked the reason for it, she replied:

"We always ran in Kalamazoo!"

She is the product of a school where physical culture predominated over everything else. As her running is noiseless, the teacher has not undertaken the almost hopeless task of breaking her.

A Chicago child of thirteen came to grief recently when the teacher placed a large apple on the desk and told the class to draw it.

"I know how to draw Greek art things," protested the child, "but I can never, never draw anything as plain as an apple. In Chicago they never made us do common things."

The teacher insisted on retaining the apple model, and a sorry job the child made of it. To prove her intimacy with Greek art "things" she drew an excellent figure of Apollo underneath the failure.

There are schools in this broad country which believe in inspiration and inclination. Some of their product is wintering in California this year and has been in conflict with the old-fashioned method of studying arithmetic from 11 o'clock until noon and grammar from 1:30 till 2. It works out this wise:

"The class will now prepare the spelling lesson for today," the teacher announces.

Out come the spelling books of all but the girl from Milwaukee, perhaps. She goes to the teacher with her tale of woe.

"I don't feel inspired to study spelling just now, teacher," she says; "I feel like geography."

The result is that the child never has the right lessons prepared at the right time, for the inspiration business has become a habit, and without it she cannot prepare a lesson.

A few days ago the pupils in a Santa Barbara grade faced the task of learning the county seats of California. It was given out one evening. The next morning the mother of an Eastern child drove up from her hotel and, with a rustle of silk petticoats, swept into the room.

"I came to ask a favor for my dear little Margarette," she said, smiling condescendingly on the teacher. "I do not wish to have her learn the county seats of California."

"But it is part of the regular course," protested the teacher, "and I cannot make distinctions."

"Nevertheless, I don't want the child to muddle her brain with any old California county seats," returned the mother, more severely. "She is going to a finishing school in the East next year, and they will not be a particle of use to her."

"I cannot pass her at the end of the term unless she learns them," said the teacher.

"I don't care if she does not pass; I won't have her muddled with county seats," and she departed.

"You would think that county seats were like measles or vaccination!" exclaimed the teacher in telling the incident. "But I told Margarette that she need not learn them unless she wanted to."

A boy of ten or eleven years, who still wore curls and a Lord Fauntleroy suit because his doting mother thought him so "cute" in them, called forth all the compassion of a big-hearted teacher of a Riverside school. She knew "her boys," and trembled for the "perfect little gentleman" when recess came. She thought to warn him against some of the tricks which had resulted disastrously for others of the mother's-darling type.

He listened respectfully, though he seemed slightly bored. When she finished, he thanked her, and, much to her surprise, added:

"But you need not worry about me, teacher. I'm not as green as I look; it's just the way they dress me."

When school was called again, a single glance over the front seats where the worst of "her boys" sat convinced her that it really was "just the way they dress me." Her two fighters, the pride of the room, had black eyes, and another was trying vainly to stop the flow of blood from his nose. The "perfect little gentleman" was somewhat bedraggled. His flowing collar was entirely wanting, and there was a wicked-looking scratch across his forehead, but his head was proudly erect and from his eyes flashed the light of victory.

Loyalty to home cities frequently crops out in written examinations, and in others a striking narrowness of view with St. Louis or Kansas City or Boston as the point of vantage. Who but the child of a Puget Sound boomer would answer that Seattle was the metropolis of the Pacific Coast, and insist on it in spite of the teacher and the geography book? Then, too, it must have been the offspring of a Nebraska Democrat who answered: "William Jennings Bryan is the greatest living statesman."

"Where does the sun rise and set?" was a question recently asked by a Pasadena teacher.

"In New York City," was the surprising answer.

"Not much doubt where that child comes from," thought the teacher, but to make sure, she asked.

"We live in Chicago," was the still more surprising answer.

"And you think the sun rises and sets in New York?"

"Mamma says all New Yorkers think it does."

The child had caught the mother's words, without the sarcasm that beyond a doubt stung in her tone of voice.

DID I ever tell you about my father? My father was what they call a gentleman of the old school. A gentleman of the old school is a man who parts his hair in the back and wears loose clothes. That was my father, all right. People used to say that if any one left any clothes lying around loose they'd see my father wearing them sooner or later. Still, he was what you might call a careful dresser. His brother Masons all used to admit that. They said he was always careful to leave the lodge ahead of the rest of them so's to have a chance to get the best overcoat.

My father used to have a cleaning and dyeing establishment where people brought their clothes to have stains and grease and things taken off. Folks do get the worst things on their clothes, don't they?—soup and jelly and stuff like that. The worst thing I ever got on mine, though, was on a fancy vest. I got a dollar on it, and the dollar turned out to be lead. But my father got something worse than that on his coat, once. You wouldn't think he'd mind it, being in the cleaning business, but he did. But not so much as mother, though. Oh, no. It was a blonde hair, and ma's hair was black. Next morning father says to me: "James, I want to give you some advice. Last night I met a poor little orphan. She seemed frightened, and I told her I wouldn't harm a hair of her head. But look what the hair of her head did to me! If I'd known what that particular hair was going to do, you bet I would have harmed it." Here my father applied a piece of raw steak to his eye and went on: "Now, James," he said, "if you want to know about the troubles a woman can cause, when you grow up and some orphan puts her head on your bosom, think about the only hair I ever brought home. Then notice how many hairs she's got—and run."

But I was talking about father's business. Father was a very able man. He guaranteed to remove anything from the clothes. When there was nothing doing in the shop he would go out on the street. He could work just as well in a crowd as anywhere. It was a curious thing, but my father never liked to work when the police were around. I suppose this was because one of them once told my father he was a pickpocket. Of course I don't know how much there was in the charge, but my father always told mother that he was a garment worker.

Do you know, but it has always seemed funny to me that two people could be so much to each other as my father and mother when I think that they were only related to each other by marriage. You see, my father thought a great deal of my mother. He was so thoughtful about her. Many a time I've seen him walking up the stairs with his shoes in his hands, and I knew he was thinking of her. It's lovely for a married couple to be that way, isn't it? As they float down the voyage of life together with old Father Time at the helm, each shares the other's thoughts more and more, till they are at least the "One" that the wedding ceremony declared them to be. You've heard of the premonitions that these husbands and wives have of impending disaster to the absent one, although no one else shared the fear. That's the way it is with my parents. One night, I remember, about 3 o'clock, when my father hadn't come home, my mother said to me: "James, there's something going to happen to your father; I feel certain of it." "Don't be foolish, mother," I said to quiet her. "How can you know anything about it?" "I feel it in my bones, son, that's all I can tell you," she said. Now wasn't that curious? Next morning I told father about it, and asked him how he figured it out. "I don't figure it out," he said, "but I feel it in my bones that it happened, all right." The bond of sympathy was very close with them. My father used to say that mother could tell him as accurately as at any time. One time he was out of town, I recollect, and mother said: "Your father's name was Reginald; they named him after a canary bird—"Reginald," she said, "I shall miss you while you're gone." "Don't feel discouraged over that," he answered. "I'll testify that you'd never miss me if I were within range."

In my father's case the course of true love ran [illegible] the loop once in a while. Mother's father [illegible] attacks of the gout because he had flattened [illegible] the champagne water when it fizzed. On these occasions his temper wasn't very placid. One night [illegible] called he was holding mother's hand. She said it was safe because her governor was upstairs [illegible]. Of course father didn't mean it, [illegible] seeing the stuffing he put into female [illegible] know that there are some figures that don't [illegible]

Father was always resourceful. I know [illegible] when he really came in juxtaposition with [illegible] tity. That is, I mean, that he ever got up against [illegible] thing. His health got bad, and he had to [illegible] and hunt a soft spot in the climate. The [illegible] could get was collecting rags and other [illegible] alleys. He plugged drearily along at that [illegible] mother were always cheerful. Every time [illegible] about his health he answered that he [illegible] steadily. BANNER OF THE BEAR WAVED IN THIS STATE THIRTY YEARS.

By a Special Contributor.

It is not known that the Banner of the Bear floated more than a century over Alaska, but the fact that it waved over a bit of Californian soil for thirty years is to be forgotten. Yet the site of the Russian settlement—with the church, the Governor's residence, the barracks, and part of one bastion, all built of redwood and all very well preserved—is now the property of the people of California and their children for it was purchased in 1903 with a portion of the fund to preserve the California landmarks. This is now called Fort Ross, and is on the coast of Sonoma county about ten miles north of the mouth of Russian River.

The story of the Russian settlement in California blends tragedy and romance. Before 1741, the western coast of America was known only as far north as Cape Mendocino. In July of that year, a Russian expedition in command of the Dane, Vitus Bering, discovered to himself, with the promise of marriage when he should return from an appeal to St. Petersburg and Madrid to establish permanent trading relations between California and Alaska. After his betrothal, Rezanof was considered a son of the Arguello family, and he was allowed to exchange his goods for food products. Then he sailed for Sitka. Concepcion waited expectantly for years, only to learn at last that he had died in Siberia on the way to St. Petersburg. Then she devoted herself to good works and charity, faithful always to his memory, in spite of numerous suitors. When the Dominican convent was founded at Benicia in 1851, she was the first nun to take the veil in California. At the convent, she died and was buried in 1857. Bret Herte has placed her story in the memorial halls of song. Had it been less sad, had her lover returned, it is more than probable that the history of this coast would deal with the Slav rather than with the Anglo-Saxon.

Rezanof was enamored of the country. He unfolded to Baranof a threefold scheme. First, he would establish a regular trade between California and Alaska; second, he would found an agricultural settlement on the Californian coast just north of San Francisco Bay, introducing Chinese laborers to do the farming. This colony would serve not only to raise products for the northern settlements, but also as a trading post for the benefit of the Californians. Third, he would locate a colony at the mouth of the Columbia River and send down offshoots to the south, until finally they could wrest California from the crown of Spain. In a letter to the company, marked "secret," he also expresses these ideas. His untimely death only saved the coast. He had great influence at court, and with his enthusiasm and his perseverance, there is little doubt that he would have accomplished his purpose, for at that time neither Great Britain nor the United States had a settlement on the Pacific.

Baranof was impressed with Rezanof's plans. He dispatched several exploring parties, one after the other, to find a suitable site for the California settlement. Finally in 1811, the territory from Bodega Bay to Fort Ross was purchased from the Indians for "3 blankets, 3 pair breeches, 2 axes, 3 hoes, and some beads." In the following year, the colony came down, ninety-five Russians, including twenty-five mechanics, and eighty Aleuts. The latter were sent to hunt otter, while the former hewed the redwoods for buildings. When all the timbers were ready, the Aleuts were recalled and the whole company fell to erecting buildings. They were put up on a table land near the Pacific, with a stream flowing to the south and redwood forests creeping up the steep hills at their back. Across the stream is a sandstone cliff, and from this was placed in the Governor's residence one of the most picturesque grey chimneys now in the State. The buildings for the Russians were grouped in a quadrangle, with a bastion on the southwest and northeast corners. On September 10, 1812, the quadrangle was completed, and dedicated with great festivities. It was named Ross, from the root of the word Russia.

Outside the quadrangle the Aleuts built their huts. Up on the hillside was planted an orchard, whose trees still yield delicious apples. At Bodega Bay were a warehouse and an agricultural station, and near the Russian River was another farm. A station was placed on the Farallons to gather sealskins and gull eggs and to dry seal and gull meat for the northern colonies. These were all established in 1812, and during their thirty years' residence the Russians made very little addition to their possessions.

The agricultural station was a failure from the start, as neither Russian nor Aleut knew how to farm, and Baranof had not been able to secure the Chinese laborers. The sea otters on the coast were soon destroyed. Then the colony fell to manufacturing all sorts of articles of leather, iron and wood, for their less enterprising neighbors. They built four vessels which carried the coasting trade for many years. They hewed timbers and made tiles for both the Sandwich Islands and Sitka. They were really the first promoters of Californian commerce with foreign countries. This they carried on in utter disregard of Spanish and Mexican tariff regulations.

The Californians personally were friendly, but the chief executive repeatedly ordered them to move out of the territory. They always replied diplomatically that Spain had not asked them to do so, and they warned California that it was unwise for the colonies of friendly power sto involve the said powers in trouble. About 1817 they laid more definite claim to the country, asserting that there was no indication on any map that the territory belonged to any European power. They spoke of their colony on the "coast of New Albion," so as to disclaim any right of Spain to land north of San Francisco Bay. During the war between Spain and her American colonies, the Russians in California boldly stated that they could hold the territory, as Spain had never considered them intruders or she would have notified them of the fact. They probably hoped for a cession from Spain, to injure the rebellious American children.

When Mexico declared herself a republic, she intimated to the Russian American Company that if the Czar would acknowledge her sovereignty she would grant them a portion of California. Baron Wrangell, then the Russian Governor in America, petitioned the Czar to recognize her, that his subjects might gain this privilege. His Imperial Majesty refused. Then Mexico became indignant and declined to have any further dealings with the officials of the company, as they were merely a commercial organization, without open diplomatic recognition. She ordered California to drive the intruders out, but the army of our State was missing. However, commercialism soon solved the difficulty.

Under Mexican law, foreign vessels were allowed to trade on the coast by paying high duties. Yankee ships flocked to the State and sold their wares cheaper than the Russians could possibly do. Then this new market for California products—for there was little specie on the coast, and hides and tallow and grain were currency—raised their price, and the Russians lost on both sides. Realizing that they would never receive the cession of the Sacramento Valley for which they had hoped, they decided in 1840 to abandon this expensive experiment in colonization. They petitioned the Czar for permission to leave Fort Ross, as it "was of no strategic value." Upon receiving permission, they looked around for a buyer for their improvements.

First, they offered their Fort Ross settlement to the Hudson Bay Company for $30,000. After deliberation, Chief Factor McLoughlin refused, so as to avoid trouble both with California and with the United States, which was now getting a solid claim to the Oregon country. Had he accepted, the British flag might now be our standard. The property was offered in vain to several Californians, but finally, in December, 1841, was sold to John Sutter for the proposed price on a credit of four years.

In the spring of 1842, the Russian colony of about a hundred men and women set sail for Sitka. In spite of climate, they had no regrets in leaving this land which they had occupied only on sufferance. They dreamed not what the near future was to disclose nor what Russia was really losing in not maintaining their foothold.

So Russia lost her colony south of 54 deg. 40 min., the line drawn between her possessions and those of the United States and of Great Britain by the treaties of 1824 and 1825. The territory north of that line, Alaska, she protected until 1867, when she sold it to us for $7,200,000. She might have parted with it sooner had not our Civil War interfered with the bargain. As early as 1859, Senator Gwin of California was negotiating with the Russian Minister at Washington, with Buchanan's approval. Then the sum of $5,000,000 was offered by the United States, but our domestic troubles ended the conference. In 1867, there seemed a likelihood of the Hudson Bay Company's getting Alaska. The Russian American Company favored a lease with them, but they delayed their answer. Senator Cole of California induced the Russian Minister, Baron de Stoeckl, to secure the sale to us, and on March 30, 1867, at 4 o'clock in the morning, the treaty giving us possession was signed by the representatives of the two governments. Had the Hudson Bay Company been more prompt in action, the history of the northwest coast might be a different book.

A BICYCLE ACCIDENT.

We met one day upon the graveled path
That probes the beauty of a forest wild,
And, though her dark eyes flashed a flame of wrath
As fierce as that of any devil's child,
I knew she was an angel, dear and sweet,
As ever chained a captive by her spell;
So rescued I her skirt-entangled feet,
While from her lips a smothered cuss-word fell.
A linnet, from his shade of leafy green
Did, cheerful, sing approval of the scene.

I secretly rejoiced that fate so kind
Had caused us there to meet beneath the shade,
And that in dire trouble I should find
This anger-flushed, entrancing little maid;
And though the frown did deepen on her face,
And trembled she with rage and sore distress,
I blessed the pedal of her naughty wheel
That thus had clutched the binding of her dress.
The linnet, from his perch upon a knot,
Sang soft approval of my impious thought.

Quite tenderly I helped her to her seat,
And wished her well, in accents meet and mild,
And as I clipped the pedals on her feet,
She shyly raised her eyes to mine and smiled.
And, as it seemed the proper thing to do,
And there were none to say me yea or nay,
I pressed her lips, fresh as the summer dew,
Before she swiftly sped upon her way!
The linnet, like an imp of Satan's own,
Sang tauntingly as I was left alone.

A Gay Snowclad Capital.

IMPRESSIONS OF ST. PETERSBURG IN WINTER ON A FOREIGNER.

From the London Express.

ST. PETERSBURG, January, 1904.—St. Petersburg in midwinter is the most picturesque capital in Europe, and it is the least patronized by foreigners.

In the summer, when the city wears an uninteresting cosmopolitan appearance, English and American tourists come in swarms, and get shaken to pieces in the Russian drouskies as they rattle over the rough roads, which are paved with cobbles shaped like petrified sheeps' kidneys.

When St. Petersburg receives her annual covesing of snow and ice, the wheeled carriages are replaced by sleighs, with jingling bells and spirited horses, which skim noiselessly over the white roads at terrific speed.

The broad flowing Neva is frozen three or four feet thick, and electric cars convey passengers across for the sum of five copecks, or one penny.

Peasants, on rough-looking skates, push huge chairs over the ice on runners at a good speed for twopence, from one side to the other, a distance of three-quarters of a mile.

The city itself is full of quaint contrasts. Homely-looking women sit on the benches in the public parks up to their knees in snow, knitting, with their children playing round them; while tall, stern-looking Russians, enveloped with furs and whiskers, stalk gloomily past.

The first things which strike the stranger are the universal politeness of the people and the absence of merriment of any kind. Russians have no sense of humor, and they seldom smile.

On entering a shop or an office, a man takes off his cap, and does not put it on again until he gets outside. At the hotels, servants wait by the door to help visitors to take their coats and overshoes off.

There is a vast gulf between servants and employers, which is never bridged over. To do anything for oneself in Russia is likely to entail disrespect from the lower classes. A Russian gentleman will wait five minutes for a man to come and take his coat off or to unlock the door of his bedroom.

Fat Sleigh Drivers.

The sleigh drivers of the first class are picturesque-looking men, and the majority of them are fat enough to make the Lord Mayor's coachman weep with envy. The ordinary tariff in St. Petersburg is twenty copecks, or fourpence, for fifteen minutes' drive; but with the best sleighs this does not count, and a bargain has to be made.

Men driving fast horses take the center of the road and vie with each other in speed. The shafts of the sleighs project on each side of the horse's head, and have a big round knob at the end. This acts like a buffer and knocks the unwary wayfarer out of the road, and enables him to be quietly run over by another sleigh passing on the side.

No one knows when the Emperor is going to drive out except the Chief of Police, and he is as communicative as an oyster on the subject. Suddenly there is a cessation of traffic in the crowded streets, hats are raised, and the Czar dashes past in a sleigh drawn by two magnificent black horses, with a Cossack standing at his back to shield him from danger.

Almost before one can realize it, the royal sleigh, with the pale blue cloths flying in the air, has gone out of sight and the traffic is resumed. Troops are never turned out to escort the Emperor except on the occasion of great functions. As a rule, he goes without parade of any kind.

There are no public-houses or cafés in Russia, but there is a good deal of drunkenness. The selling of wines and spirits is a government monopoly. Peasants and working men can get a bottle of vodka for sevenpence, and take it out into the street to drink or take it home. Vodka is a pure alcohol, distilled from corn or barley, generally, and tastes like weak gin and quinine. There are a certain number of restaurants where liquors can be obtained, but it is necessary to order food with them.

Devout Russia.

St. Petersburg has numbers of very handsome churches which contain valuable paintings and mosaics, set with precious stones, worth millions of roubles.

The Russians as a race pray more publicly than any other people in the world, not excepting the Mohammedans. Shrines are erected all over the city, and the devout Russian pauses to utter a prayer at one shrine, and then looks across the street to pray to another one on the other side. The coldest weather does not make the slightest difference in that respect to men or women. They always pray, but seldom wash.

Russian cooking is rather indifferent, and the best restaurants have French chefs. They are frightfully expensive, but the wealthy Russian spends his money, and thinks nothing of paying thirty shillings for a short drive in a troika (three horses abreast, the two outside galloping and the center horse trotting.)

The best part of the dinner generally is the hors d'oeuvres, or zakouskis, as they are called. They consist of a number of small appetizing dishes, caviar, smoked salmon, smoked sturgeon, pickled mushrooms, herring salads, Russian sardines, and a variety of other things. The attendant hands each customer a small plate and a fork. You pay 35 copeks (7d.) for a glass of vodka, and eat as much as you like.

At the present time the entire civilized world is excited over the prospect of a war between Russia and Japan, but in St. Petersburg it is scarcely mentioned except by foreigners.

Silence is Golden.

The Russian who knows his business does not discuss affairs of state in public places. A young lawyer five weeks ago addressed a meeting of students on the foreign policy of the government. Next day he was politely notified that it would be better for his health if he left St. Petersburg at once for Archangel, in the far north on the White Sea, and sojourned there for five years. Accordingly, the young advocate packed up at once and tarried not on his departure.

The Chief of Police governs the city with an iron hand shod with the softest velvet. It is easy enough to get into Russia, but the difficulty is to get out. No one, either Russian or foreigner, can cross the frontier without a permit from the Chief of Police in the city he has last been staying in. At the German frontier station, Eydtkunen, the train stops forty-five minutes to give the passengers time to think whether they really wish to enter Russia or not.

Then the train goes slowly on a few hundred yards, crosses a small river, where the German and Russian sentries face each other on opposite banks, and enters the frontier station, Wirballen.

All passengers alight and walk into the customhouse. Their passports are taken from them at the door. The examination of baggage is perhaps the strictest in Europe.

It is opened in the presence of three or four persons, and there is no tipping. After all the passports have been duly entered and rigidly scrutinized, they are handed to the officers, who call out the names of the holders.

In answer to the call the passenger opens his baggage, and after it has been passed he is handed a pink ticket which entitles him to his passport at the door. Russians have to get their passports renewed every six months or pay a fine.

A Jew from Berlin who was on the train with us had to pay a fine of £15 because his passport was out of date. On arrival at a hotel in a Russian city the foreigner hands over his passport to the clerk, who sends it at once to the police for notification. On leaving, it is returned to the traveler.

Foreigners are treated very politely everywhere in Russia, and are not followed by spies or interfered with in any way unless they speak loudly in public places as to the doings of the Czar, the Church, or the government.

In that case they are politely but firmly requested to depart at once, and recommended not to leave their hotel until the train starts. A slip of paper is handed to them by the police, and their passport is given them at the Russian frontier by a stranger. He has been on the train all the time, but out of sight.

Winter is the gayest time in St. Petersburg, when the theaters, operas and all kinds of amusements are in full swing. Skating rinks are formed on the smaller streams which run through the city by sinking cut-down old boats in the water and letting it freeze over.

There is then no danger of drowning if the ice gives way. In St. Petersburg everyone rides, and the people, especially the women, are inclined to embonpoint and laziness. To walk is to run the risk of getting heart trouble. The cold weather is dry and agreeable.

Like Home.

This year the winter in St. Petersburg has been very changeable, bitter cold one day, snowstorm the next, and followed by mild, bright sunshine.

On Friday, January 15, it rained all day in St. Petersburg, and an Englishman, who came all the way from London to have some good skating, burst into tears when he got out of the train and felt the icy rain on his upturned face. It made him feel homesick.

In Russia it is considered very bad form to carry an umbrella, no matter what happens. The people wear their furs without regard to the thermometer.

The hotels, restaurants and private houses have double windows packed with cotton wool, and double doors. The rooms are all kept heated, night and day. There are men specially employed to keep out fresh air, even through a keyhole.

The bright uniform of the military and naval officers, and the picturesque costumes of the peasants give color and life to the streets.

The dangers of visiting Russia have been greatly exaggerated by tourists, and there is no country where the stranger is more hospitably received and entertained.

It is a very dear country to live in for foreigners. The Russian rouble is worth about 2s. 11-2d. in English, and goes about as far as a shilling in London.

JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN.

THE ODDITIES AND ECCENTRICITIES OF THE ENGLISH LEADER.

[London Daily Express:] In addition to being the greatest British statesman of the day, Mr. Chamberlain is one of the most interesting and fascinating personalities. Today, when the name of Chamberlain the statesman is on everybody's lips, the following anecdotes of Chamberlain the man will be of peculiar interest:

Most statesmen work hard, but few work so hard as the late colonial secretary. The staff of the colonial official declare that they never had a chief who got through such a quantity of work. They speak feelingly, for when a government official is presided over by a chief of unusual activity and energy the staff have to exhibit an activity and energy in keeping.

Mr. Chamberlain is a late riser, but to counterbalance this he begins his work while he is still in bed. He reads newspapers and a quantity of official documents before he rises. In this he differs from another famous statesman, who has put it on record that he never reads the newspapers. When Mr. Chamberlain settles down to work for the day he does it swiftly and methodically. All his papers are kept in beautiful order, and his secretary can lay his hand in a moment on the most important Blue Book or the most trivial memorandum.

As is notorious, Mr. Chamberlain takes little or no exercise. He is a great smoker, however, and does most of his work with the aid of a cigar. The advocates of physical culture and the opponents of tobacco will both find matter for reflection in the fact that, despite his abstention from the one and his devotion to the other, Mr. Chamberlain enjoys excellent health. He is vigorous and a good deal more vigorous mentally than athletes of a third of his age.

There is one form of exercise in which Mr. C[hamberlain] does take an interest, however. He is an expert golfer. A gentleman who happened to stay at the same hotel at Scarborough as Mr. Chamberlain years ago, when the latter was a leading statesman had only just entered the House of Commons, has related that he used to see Mr. Chamberlain, towel in hand, setting forth for the sea every morning, though it was then late in the year. In the days of swimming and diving competitions the future colonial minister usually came in first, with Mr. Austin Chamberlain, then a lad, a good second.

In public Mr. Chamberlain, as his opponents will admit, is determined, hard-headed, and essentially the typical Englishman. In private he is very different. He is fond of children, for instance. He takes a great interest in the small members of his family, with whom he is as popular as he is with the constituents of West Birmingham. No stronger proof could be used than that, by the way. Those who have met the member for West Birmingham address him as "Joe," and all of his supporters have yet to learn what pomposity is.

To return to the children. Here is a story illustrating Mr. Chamberlain's kindness to the little ones. It is told by a lady who was once a scholar at Highbury Sunday-school. That Sunday-school has the custom of holding its annual treat in the grounds of Highbury. Mr. Chamberlain enjoyed watching the children disporting about his grounds as much as they themselves enjoyed it themselves. One of the games was a ring game, something like kissin-in-the-ring. One of the children stands in the center, and the others dance round calling on her to "Choose you one, choose you two, choose the fairest of the three." Mr. Chamberlain himself was in the ring, and was chosen by the small mistress. He kissed the little maid gallantly, to the delight of the players.

An anecdote illustrating Mr. Chamberlain's [illegible] Once at a banquet, an old goblet was exhibited. Curiosity was expressed as to its age. There was a date on the goblet, and looking at the screw, Mr. Chamberlain was able to inform his host that the goblet dated from the eighteenth century. There was nothing very remarkable in this, perhaps, but it shows that Mr. Chamberlain is a theorist, but a man who knows his business.

ESKIMO BATH NO JOKE.

Boys who make a fuss because their mothers make them to take frequent baths should be glad they are not Eskimo children, living on the shores of Behring Sea. In that cold region of Alaska all the boys and men regularly take a sweat bath every week, and this bath is no joke. A fire of driftwood is built in the center of the kashim—the one-roomed house where the men and boys of the village pass most of their time—and when the smoke has passed off and the wood is reduced to red glowing coals, a cover is put over the smoke hole in the roof, and the place becomes intensely hot. The bathers then must take off their clothes and sit about in the hot, stuffy, like apartment until their skin becomes as red as the back of a boiled lobster and seem on the point of bursting.

Owing to the intense heat the bathers are obliged to wear respirators to protect their lungs. These respirators are pads of shavings bound together, concave on the inside and convex on the outside, and large enough to cover the mouth, nose and part of the cheeks of the wearer. Across the inside runs a little wooden bar which is held in the teeth to keep the respirator in position. The boys sit there until they are dripping with perspiration, and then they rush outside into the intense cold and roll in the snow.

Mr. E. W. Nelson, who spent between four and five years in investigating for the government the Eskimos of the Behring Strait, says: "On several occasions I have seen them from the sweat bath to holes in the ice of the neighboring stream, and, squatting there, pour ice-cold water on their backs and shoulders with a wooden dipper, evidently experiencing the greatest pleasure from the operation. Although the Eskimo boys seem to withstand the cold as this all right, and even to enjoy it, it would in all probability, kill any white boy who tried it."—Chicago Tribune.

FOR MULE AND MAN.

A story was told at one of the clubs the other night by a well-known physician. It was an experience he had had on a country road with a negro driver who had hired him a balky mule. Sam tried his best to move the obstinate beast, but it was no go. Finally the physician, seeing by, Sam appealed to him for help, and he gave the mule a dose of medicine which fairly made him fly down the road.

"Hol' on, dar, boss!" cried Sam. "What's dat for cos' me?"

"Ten cents," replied the doctor.

"Wall, yer better give me 20 cents' worth. I'll git dat mule!"—[Philadelphia Telegraph.

KEPT IT TIGHT.

"What is this?" asked Mr. Pneer, stopping at the novelty counter.

"This is a handy little arrangement for carrying loose change," said the salesman, proceeding to show him a new style of coin holder.

"Loose change? I never have any," remarked Pneer, passing on.—[Chicago Tribune.

...About this time Co. A went on picket one night, and this ...tenant was put in charge of the post. He was charged ...e that his post kept a sharp lookout for the enemy, ...ague rumors were afloat that they were liable to ...e a dash through the mountain gaps to the east of us ...y time. So long as there was no enemy in sight, the ...e thing was still something of a picnic to such chaps ...e lieutenant. He had discovered that Sabberville was ...good deal frightened at the prospect of an attack, and he ...some doubts as to his usefulness when his watch came. ...He thought it a good time to have a little sport at his ...pense, and perhaps break him of his bragging habit of telling what he would do if only turned loose against the enemy.

The night was dark and moonless. Even the stars were obscured by thick clouds. The post was on the edge of an old field, grown up to sumac, and chinquapin bushes. When it came Sabberville's turn to go on, he was placed alone, but with a couple of trusty men in the brush near by, unknown to him. He was told the enemy would probably undertake to steal by the post and surprise the c... and to shoot if anything stirred that did not answer his challenge.

The night was a peculiarly still one, and standing on his lonely post, Sabberville began to get nervous. Every little noise seemed greatly exaggerated. Even the squeak of the field mice and the occasional cry of a night bird seemed loud and startling. The poor fellow grew more and more nervous. The hidden watchers saw, by the dim light, that he was trembling and apparently ready to fly on the slightest pretext.

Now, the mule Pete was in the habit, when not turning the winze, to wander according to his own sweet will wherever he liked in or out of camp. Just at this time he came browsing along through the picket line out into the sumac and chinquapin brush. Wherever he went, he always got back to the store shed in the morning for his breakfast of corn.

It was getting into the "wee sma' hours" of the night, and when the lieutenant saw him, he knew he would not go far before he turned back toward camp. An idea struck him that here was a chance for some fun, without stopping to think that it might be fatal to Pete and involve himself in an infraction of discipline. Thereupon he started Pete off on a diagonal line that would take him about opposite the post of Sabberville.

Meantime, the latter's senses were becoming intensely acute, and every noise that floated to his ears on the still night air was exaggerated by his growing fears. Presently he heard a peculiar sound. He could not make it out, but it was principally of a grinding sort, with now and then a thud as of a blow on the dry ground. The poor fellow listened intently, and satisfied himself that it was drawing nearer. Stooping down, he peered over the tops of the sumacs, trying to discover if there was anything moving against the dark sky beyond.

For some moments he looked in vain. There was not a motion in front of him, but still that nerve-irritating grinding went on, and drew nearer. If he could only see something, he would shoot, he thought, and relieve the tension of his mind. But there was nothing to shoot at. It was only a vague terror in front of him. He thought at one time he would have to run or call out the guard. But his intense dread of being laughed at kept him on his post. The other boys had been quietly given the tip by the lieutenant, and they were awaiting the issue. They could see from their hiding place that Sabberville was greatly excited.

He crept stealthily back and forth, ever and anon stooping to bring any possible moving object in range of the sky. More than once he raised his rifle as if to shoot, and they began to fear for old Pete, for with all his brag and dandy manners, the young fellow was a most excellent shot, and had done his share at the occasional target shoots to bring Co. A's record up.

All at once, as he stopped and peered, his heart jumped into his throat with a great bound; he was sure he saw something move against the eastern sky where the first faint glimmer of the coming day had made its appearance. He raised his rifle and looked harder than ever. Yes, sure enough, there was a pointed, narrow object outlined against the sky. Frightened almost to death, his pride only kept him from running, with possibly the knowledge that, if he kept cool enough, he was good for one dead shot, anyway.

In a moment as he looked, he saw first one object and then another; sometimes both together and again one and then the other. Whatever the objects were, they moved now sideways, now towards him slowly, now both disappearing, and all the time that grinding and occasional thud as before, and always nearer. He was sure at first it was an officer's plume, and then it appeared like a couple of muskets at right-shoulder-shift.

But whatever it was, when it was within 150 feet of him, it or they stopped and stood up straight against the sky for a moment, and then started slowly directly towards him. Old Pete had noted the approach of dawn, and, having browsed all night, thought it time to get back to his shed by the storehouse, to be in time for his morning ration of corn.

Sabberville heard the steady tramp of his hoofs, saw the two objects he had been watching advancing upon him, and, now sure it was the enemy in some guise or other, he called out in loud but startled tones: "Who goes there?" There was no response, of course, but Pete, hearing his voice and thinking he was among his friends, started into a gentle trot, which Sabberville construed into a rush of the enemy, and, hastily taking aim at one of the moving objects, he fired.

Instantly the still air was shattered by a terrific frightened bray from Old Pete, who broke for camp on a keen jump through the brush, giving forth a tremendous "hee-haw" with every bound.

The sudden noise and rush towards him were too much for Sabberville, and throwing down his rifle, he also broke for camp, yelling at the top of his voice: "Oh! boys, I've shot a man! I've shot a man!" And away he went towards the rifle pits, with Pete a close second.

Of course, the shot and general uproar the two made roused the entire camp, and the long roll called every man out, and in less time than it takes to tell it, the works were lined with half-dressed men and bristling with muskets, while every artilleryman was by his gun, and shot and shell were rammed home in a hurry.

Sabberville broke through the camp and never stopped until, pale and trembling, he sank down in Co. A's quarters, while Pete went straight to his shed, where he stopped his braying.

It was fully an hour before the matter was explained, and the camp restored to its normal condition, but it was a long time before it became known what part the lieutenant played in the comedy which might have proved a tragedy for poor Pete, whose phenomenally long ears, outlined against the sky as he browsed on the bushes, had been the enemy that frightened Sabberville, whose deadly aim had pierced one of them close to his head, making an ugly hole.

A couple of weeks later Pete strayed outside of camp again, and a band of guerrillas gobbled him up and we saw him no more. The effect on Sabberville was great. When he knew the facts, he was completely crushed. His brag was all gone. The boys made it worse by a habit they fell into of dropping all conversation whenever he appeared, whereupon some one would remark in tragic tones: "Say, Sabberville shot a man!"

But stirring times followed quickly, and in the rush of fight and subsequent capture, the event became only a funny memory. Sabberville proved a good soldier, in the end, and won the respect of his superior officers.

Both he and the lieutenant are still alive, and will doubtless read this with a hearty laugh.

NOVEL OCCUPATIONS.

SOME CURIOUS WAYS MEN HAVE OF EARNING THEIR LIVING.

[Pearson's Weekly:] Some time back a certain firm found itself in possession of a big stock of coppers, of which it experienced considerable difficulty in getting rid of.

An enterprising employé volunteered to try to exchange them for gold and silver money, in his own time, if he were allowed a small commission. To this his employers readily agreed.

The man got rid of such large quantities at public houses and other places where coppers frequently changed hands, that the thought struck him there might be a living to be made at the business if taken up systematically. He visited the offices of various gas companies and banks, and offered to exchange their pennies and half pennies for them at regular intervals and as often as might be required.

Before very long he had worked up a splendid connection, and has now cut adrift altogether from his old firm, rides in his own carriage, and hands to new clients a dainty, gilt-edged card with the words "Mr. So-and-So, copper exchanger," inscribed thereon.

The dummy safemaker is another curious product of modern business life. A big, solid-looking safe, conspicuously displayed in a shop or office, is a great inspirer of confidence. But big safes, if they are real, cost a deal of money—so much as £100 or £150, some of them.

The dummies can be bought for from thirty to fifty shillings apiece; and are, to all outward appearance, the exact counterparts of the genuine articles. They are all made by one man, a carpenter in South London, who first discovered the possibilities of the trade and developed it.

He uses the cheapest and commonest of wood, but is lavish with the paint pot, and the handles, locks and other accessories are solid and genuine. The result evidently meets adequately the purpose for which it is intended, for his queer business has so increased that he now employs several workmen and is extending his premises.

There are probably a score or more of "quartern-fetchers" in London. They are all women, respectable, and of quiet and even lady-like appearance and demeanor. Their spheres of operations all lie in the respectable middle-class suburbs.

For thereabouts public houses are comparatively few and far between. And even if they were many and close together, it is social death for the women folk of villadom to enter them unescorted by husband or brother.

Nevertheless, at noon or thereabouts, the said women folk feel the need, like the men folk, of a whisky and soda. They cannot go for it themselves. So they are bound to avail themselves of the services of the "quartern-fetcher."

She goes by this name, but as a matter of fact it is a half quartern she usually "fetches." For this, if it is a proprietary whisky, and it almost always is, she charges sixpence. The publican she patronizes supplies it to her at fourpence.

Her fee for the errand is one penny, but she frequently gets twopence or threepence. There is also a penny charged by the publican on the little bottle in which the spirit is contained, and which is repaid on its return. This deposit the "fetcher" is accustomed to look upon as her perquisite.

It will thus be seen that she nets from fourpence to sixpence over each errand, and as she has frequently forty or fifty clients on her list, who avail themselves of her services regularly at least once every day, it will be readily seen that her income is by no means a small one.

The "step girl" is another comparatively modern suburban innovation, born of the dearth of domestic servants. With scrubbing brush, flannel, and pail she perambulates the streets, and washes and "whitens" the front-door steps at a penny a "time."

Finally, there is that aristocrat of peripatetic "domestics," the traveling "lady cook," who drives up to your front door in her own private hansom, and whose fee for superintending the preparation of your dinner for an evening varies from five guineas upwards.

She also affects a "rig-out," which is not unlike the typical nurse's uniform, and her official manner is a singular blending of social deference and professional arrogance. She needs waiting on, too; an assistant cook must be at her beck and call, together with the usual kitchen maid, vegetable maid, stillroom maid, pastry maid, and the other maids without which a fashionable cook cannot perform her duties.

But, in return, you will be able to set before your guests a meal such as a resident fifteen-hundred-a-year chef, did you possess one, would scarcely be able to improve upon

SOMETHING OF THE INDIANS WHO MAKE THE FAMOUS BLANKETS.

By a Special Contributor.

THE abundance of Navajo rugs and blankets in market might lead one to suppose that the entire tribe sat up nights to weave and think up new color schemes. But the Navajo never saw many of the articles which bear his name. As a matter of fact, he leaves this part of domestic economy to his wife, and she proceeds about it in a very leisurely manner.

In weaving, the women go through the whole primitive process. They take the wool from the sheep, fashion it into a long thick yarn, and dye it with colors manufactured from roots and leaves. The colors are crude. Some of the most beautiful of the blankets are left the natural gray of the wool and ornamented only in white.

It is interesting to watch one of these women working. If the blanket is large, it takes up one side of the hut. Sometimes, if its size is such as to conflict with domestic arrangements, it is set up outside. The frame is made of two stout poles connected by a horizontal cross piece. From the latter a smaller pole is suspended by means of small ropes. This in turn supports another pole over which are drawn the cords which form the foundation of the blanket. Two sets of cords run lengthwise. They are stretched taut by long, thin pieces of wood placed between. The squaw usually sits flat on the floor before the frame. She is not an especially romantic-looking object. She has the conventional squaw form, and her coarse black hair is tied up with a red rag. But the clumsy-looking fingers fly as she weaves the colors in and out, patting them down deftly with a paddle-shaped little stick. With lightning-like swiftness she changes from one color to another. The strands are never counted, but the design, when completed, is to the eye geometrically perfect. Each squaw has her own design, and the secret of it dies with her. Some of these blankets command a high price, as they cannot be duplicated.

These women work from three weeks to three months on a blanket. Then if they are exceeding thirsty and the opportunity offers, they will sell the product of their slow toil for three or four dollars.

These Indians are a kindly-disposed people to those who evince a friendly interest in them. I knew a man who strode into their good graces by a judicious use of the word "Sha-dan-ee" (brother-in-law,) and by occasionally joining in their dances.

The dancing is not a difficult performance. The essentials are endurance, a strong voice, and a tin can containing enough pebbles to make a respectable noise. The men form in a circle, hop on one foot, shake the can, and yell at regular intervals. They take a grave interest in the novice, and finally reward his efforts with the weighty compliment, "Alla same Navajo."

The Indians are very fond of this monotonous dance. They will keep it up all night after a hard day's work, and for a week at a stretch. A couple of hours' sleep seems to satisfy them. Possibly their religious belief inspires their energy. Just what this belief is, it is impossible to say, but the evil spirit figures largely in it. They are always trying to keep him good-natured. During the corn season it becomes a pleasure as well as a duty. At this time the usually industrious Navajo cannot be induced to work. He sits in the shade and consumes unlimited quantities of corn—cob and all. A distracted overseer, while vainly endeavoring to induce his men to return to work, stumbled on the following legend:

"In the beginning, the Navajoes came into the world on a notched stick, very weary with the climbing. With them came all the animals. The last one in was the turkey. Him they killed, for they were very hungry. In his craw they found a grain of corn. This they planted. Ever since then corn has been held sacred. They believe that the devil will be angry with them if they do not eat all the year's crop, and that he will show his displeasure by taking it all away from them."

The Navajo is pretty much primitive man still. At times it crops out in an amusing way. Almost every man has a gun, of which he is immensely proud. But when he goes out hunting rabbits, and a festive jack begins his kangaroo leaps, he is too much excited to fire. Away goes the gun, and it becomes a personal matter between the Navajo and the jack. Invariably it ends in a victory for the former.

One day as a gang of Navajos were busily at work, it happened that a division superintendent and several other officials high in railroad circles chose to include them in a tour of inspection. The section boss was swelling over the energetic work of his Indians. Alas for human pride! A fiend of a jack rabbit started up—a challenge no Navajo could resist. A hundred picks and shovels struck the ground on the instant, and away went the band cross country. The officials stared open-mouthed, wondering if the red men were unionized and if they were witnessing a strike. In ten minutes they were back with the original Jack and some dozen others that they had started up and captured. One of the most enthusiastic pursuers was a tough old Indian of ninety.

Their process of cooking is simple. The jack, just as he is, is thrown on the fire. Later on he is raked out, rolled in the sand until the charred fur and skin are eliminated, and salted, if the salt happens to be handy. Then he disappears without further ceremony.

They do not, however, confine themselves to the comparatively tame pursuit of running down jack rabbits. The fact that they must not kill antelopes adds zest to the hunt, and they do kill many. One night the same crew of men mentioned before had succeeded in bringing down ten. They made their timekeeper happy by presenting him with a magnificent pair of antlers. They were on the move the next morning, and at Gallup three game wardens boarded the train. The timekeeper was decidedly uneasy. It had seemed a little thing to accept the head, but with these men in sight he suddenly remembered the $500 fine attached to such a possession. He concealed it underneath a mattress and tried to keep cool. He sauntered up and down the platform, wondering if he would have any Navajoes to keep time for, the next day, or if he would be there to keep time for them. All this time the Indians stood up, stiff and straight, with their blankets wrapped dignifiedly round them, watching the search with disinterested eyes. The three officials poked carefully through the cars and came back empty-handed.

The timekeeper was exceedingly anxious as to how those ten deer had been disposed of. As he was "an alla same Navajo man," he was let into the secret. One of the men drew back his blanket. There were the hind quarters of an antelope securely strapped to his waist.

Another incident helped make that morning a memorable one to the timekeeper, and made him regret, for the time being, that he was on such friendly terms with the natives. The westbound passenger was in. The [illegible] were making the most of primitive man as [illegible] the Navajoes. Meanwhile, the squaws, what time they [illegible] not dexterously evading kodaks, were tempting their [illegible] itary enemies with displays of hand-carved silver [illegible] bead necklaces, and belts. The magnet of a pretty [illegible] drew the timekeeper near one of these groups. [illegible] the squaws recognized him, and he returned her [illegible] ing with a courteous "Hala hanie?" (How are you?) [illegible] listen!" exclaimed the pretty girl in a low, disgusted [illegible] "he's calling her his honey."

Their language is not musical. To the [illegible] seems a series of grunts. But it is expressive, at least [illegible] timekeeper was known as "Natzosechlin" (the man [illegible] writes.) A big, rough section boss was called "[illegible] (the bear,) while a happy-go-lucky Irishman was "[illegible] Bahashon" (Happy Jack.)

When they sing, the words lose some of their [illegible] They have three different kinds of songs—one for [illegible] one for funerals, and one for drunkenness. In their [illegible] aration for a feast, they always arrange for one [illegible] stay sober to sing.

The song for sickness is a low chant. The [illegible] man stands before his patients, swaying his body [illegible] time of the droning music. Often he succeeds in [illegible] the sufferer into a hypnotic sleep. However, if the [illegible] tient refuses to be sung well, the next remedy [illegible] prove startling. For a young girl who was dying [illegible] disease, the medicine man prescribed the bite [illegible] snake upon her brother's cheek.

If the patient persists in dying, a renewal of [illegible] nies awaits him. The body is burned on a fire [illegible] until charred. It is then wrapped round and round [illegible] cloth, and sewed up in sacks. At night time it is [illegible] out to a tree and hung high in its branches. [illegible] long the weird funeral chant goes on—a doleful [illegible] ing sound that can be heard for miles.

The marriage tie is lightly assumed. A man may [illegible] as many wives as he can afford. Not that they are [illegible] pense to him after marriage, but he must buy [illegible] the first place. A man is likely to have more [illegible] than he can account for on the spur of the moment. [illegible] father, being asked, did not reply, but began making [illegible] marks on the sand. "So many," he said finally, [illegible] to the lines. There were forty-nine.

The fact that these Indians have retained their [illegible] beliefs and customs in spite of their contact with [illegible] whites makes them interesting. But now they are [illegible] to fall into step in the march of civilization. At the [illegible] ent moment, preparations are being made for the [illegible] ing of a Navajo Indian school.

Horses in Battle.

A SOLDIER TELLS STORIES OF HOW THEY BEHAVE.

By Maj. J. A. Watrous, U.S.A.

JAMES F. LYON of the First Wisconsin Cavalry, told me this story about a good horse in battle—a story which Gen. O. H. LaGrange of that regiment, now Governor of the National Home for Soldiers in California, confirms: He had in our company a young German named Schultz. His horse was his especial pride. Sometimes Schultz went to sleep without rations, but his horse never. No matter how scarce or how hard it was to get forage, the young German's horse always had an evening feed, a thorough rubbing-down, a loving pat and a 'Good-night, Frank,' in two languages—broken English and German. Many a time have I seen Schultz skirmish for a lunch for his horse when we halted to make coffee, instead of preparing his own lunch. While the rest of us stayed in our tents and read or played cards, Schultz would keep Frank's company for hours, sometimes talking German to him and sometimes English. Some of our horses showed lack of care; Frank showed overcare; was always in good order; his coat glistened like a new plug hat, and seemed as proud of his master as his master of him. When the Atlanta campaign opened in May, 1864, there was not a prouder soldier or a prettier horse than Schultz and Frank on the line.

Our first fight of note in that campaign was at Varnell's Station, May 9. Somebody—never mind who—made a mess of it. Our little brigade, the Second of the First Cavalry Division, consisting of the Second and Fourth Indiana and the First Wisconsin, commanded by Col. O. H. LaGrange, was thrown against Gen. Joe Wheeler's entire command, and we fought it all day. We started to charge, but were halted in a piece of woods and were ordered to fight on foot. We were already under fire and in considerable confusion, and only a portion of the command heard the order, so it happened that some of us fought as cavalry and some as infantry. Schultz remained mounted, and did heroic service. Early in the fight his pet was shot. As the animal made but little fuss over it and settled down quickly, his rider thought it was only a slight wound, and remained in the battle all day, having traveled many miles in the performance of important and dangerous tasks, the wounded animal seeming to enter into the spirit of the work as completely as his master. That night, at 9 o'clock, the brigade camped. The moment Frank was unsaddled, he lay down. Schultz thought it was because the horse, like himself, was tired, and, after patting him and telling him in both languages what a splendid fellow he had been that day, and thanking him for carrying him safely through one of the hottest battles, he busied himself with supper-getting. In the forage bag were several extra ears of corn. After his own meal of black coffee, crackers and uncooked white pork, such a banquet as many a soldier has been more thankful for than he was for the feast of last Thanksgiving, Schultz shelled the corn and took it to Frank. The horse did not welcome him as usual; did not rest his head on his master's shoulder and look, if he did not speak, thanks in such a master. He didn't hear Schultz announce in German that he was coming with a double ration. Frank was dead and stiffening, showing that soon after lying down, life had departed.

When Schultz realized that his pet was dead, he threw the corn down, dropped by the side of the animal, tenderly laid one hand on his neck and with the other gently rubbed his head, as he had done many times before, and sobbed like a child. In talking about his loss the next day he said: 'My poor Frank could not tell me he was badly hurt and ask to go to the hospital, as I would have done had I been shot. He carried me all day as if he thought it was his duty, and that things would go wrong if he didn't, and when the battle was over and I was getting supper he lay down and died. That horse was a better soldier than I am—than any man in the regiment. Not one of us would have fought all day with such a hurt as he. No one would have expected it of us, yet I expected it of Frank, and he did not fail me. I shall never ask as much of anything again as long as I live.' With this outburst the poor fellow broke down again, and none of his comrades made light of the young German's sorrow; they knew it was sincere."

That was a story about a good horse and a good soldier. Now let me tell you about one of the trials of a good soldier with a bad horse. The late Gen. John A. Logan, who fought his way from lieutenant of a company to commander of a brigade, bought a magnificent roan a few days before Gen. Grant began the closing campaign. The roan was a high-spirited creature, tall, powerfully built and speedy, Kellogg was greatly pleased with his new possession. His staff had to do a good deal of fast riding for a week before the closing scenes of the great contest began. The general seemed to want every one in the Fifth corps to see his handsome roan, so he rode from camp to camp making social calls, his staff, made up largely of new riders, bobbing and jolting behind him. There was not a man of Kellogg's military family but regretted the birth of that roan. He was jolting their young lives away.

The day of reckoning came at the battle of Gravelly Run, or, as some call it, White Oak Road, March 31, 1865. Kellogg massed his brigade in a piece of woods. About 10 o'clock it became necessary to move quickly to a better position and get into line of battle for immediate business, for a division of the other folks was coming that way practicing on their famous "Yell" song. Just as the brigade was in line, and almost before it had got its beating heart well under foot, the enemy poured a vast sheet of lead at us. "Stand fast, men; hold your ground!" commanded Kellogg from his roan. Then came another volley. That, with the roar and the rattle of the Union guns, was too much for the roan. He bounded into the air and seemed to turn around, facing the rear, before he struck the ground. In spite of Kellogg's weight on the bits and his frantic "whoas," the roan "limbered" to the rear at a greater speed than he had ever traveled while churning the staff into a side ache. Away they dashed, horse and rider, and at a most critical time. It was a hot fight, and no time for the general to limber to the rear. Just as the chief of staff ordered an orderly to go to the general's rescue and give him a safe horse, I saw Kellogg slide down to the tail of the flying roan and start on a dead run for the line of battle. The hot comments Gen. Kellogg made on his roan that and the next day would make a thick book wholly unfit for family and church use.

It is due to the equine population to say that it was a very uncommon thing for a horse to try to get away from a battle. A thousand men longingly looked for a chance to "limber" to the rear and "cool coffee" during a fight where one horse even tried to escape bullets. The man reasoned and the horse didn't. Most horses in battle, unless wounded, were as unconcerned, apparently, as if they had been pulling plows or reapers. The man in battle who was as unconcerned as one holding a plow or driving a reaper was a fool. Men who say they were as happy and contented in a battle as while at home on the farm or eating a Christmas dinner lie. Such a thing is impossible, unless, as stated, the man is a fool; and fools didn't enlist.

Treasures that Vanished.

A FORTUNE AWAITS THE ONE WHO CAN FIND ANY OF THEM.

From Pearson's Weekly.

THE death of Mr. Whistler has recalled to recollection the fact that his missing masterpiece still remains among the mysteries.

It was an exquisitely beautiful portrait of an exquisitely beautiful child, and upon it the artist lavished his best work.

As the picture progressed, so did Whistler's enthusiasm increase. He was so wrapped up in his task that he could scarcely bear to tear himself away from it, even for meals.

Then, just as he was putting the finishing touches to it, came a summons to Paris. At first he declared he would not go; then that, at all events, his precious canvas must accompany him.

It was accordingly packed for shipment. And from that day to this all trace of it has been lost.

The picture had previously been bespoken by a certain art-loving millionaire; and, when its evanishment was reported, painter and would-be owner joined in a strenuous effort to discover its whereabouts.

But in vain! No one had seen it. No one remembered even having noticed a package corresponding with Whistler's description of his lost property. And so the matter stands at the present moment. Yet it is difficult to believe that the canvas could have been destroyed, either wilfully, or accidentally. And there is, therefore, the probability that someone at some time may discover its hiding place.

One thing is certain. He will be a lucky person who does so. For the portrait is acknowledged to have been worth more than any other work Whistler ever executed—which is saying a good deal.

A fortune awaits the man who is lucky enough to discover the whereabouts of Sidney Cooper's lost masterpiece, "The Monarch of the Meadows," formerly the property of Mr. J. D. Allcroft.

This remarkable canvas was undoubtedly stolen. Mr. Allcroft's house was under repair. Early one morning the workmen observed smoke issuing from a room in which the picture had been stored for safety. Rushing in, they found that it had been cut from its frame, and that the apartment had been fired in several places.

The picture, it may be mentioned, represents a young bull standing in a meadow, with a cow and a calf reposing at his feet.

Only in 1902, again, there vanished from the Paris Hotel de Ville Bertholon's famous landscape, "The Seine at St. Denis." It is worth £20,000, and is so well known that it would be impossible to offer it for sale anywhere without detection. Yet no hint of its whereabouts has yet leaked out.

Even more strange was the fate of "The Countess of Derby," by Sir Joshua Reynolds, which disappeared from the family picture gallery. Reward after reward was offered for its recovery by the then Earl of Derby. But it was never found, nor to this day has any light been shed on the mystery of its evanishment.

Another case in point was the loss by Mr. Baynham, of Woodville Lodge, Clayton, Sussex, of his family portraits. This was a carefully pre-arranged burglary, but none the less mysterious, for all that. Besides the family portraits, the thieves also carried away a full-length picture of the Earl of Rochester, a half-length of Queen Henrietta Maria, and another of Prince Rupert, the whole valued at about £15,000.

In 1848, again, a number of valuable works of art vanished from the Royal Academy during the exhibition, and were never heard of afterwards. They were chiefly statuettes, marble medallions, and bronze busts. Whoever possesses them must keep his treasures closely to himself, for, although the affair happened so many years ago, they are well-known by repute to all dealers and collectors throughout the world.

The same remark, too, applies to France's magnificent collection of coins and medals stolen from the Royal Library at Paris on the night of November 16, 1851.

Roughly, the value of these was estimated at about a million and a quarter of pounds sterling, but they would probably have fetched much more at public auction, for the bulk of the specimens were unique.

They had been gathered together by successive Kings of France during many centuries, and were kept at the Louvre until the assassination of their custodian—a man named Bruneau—by robbers, whose design it was to carry off the treasure. In this, however, they were unsuccessful, and the collection was transferred to the Royal Library "for greater security."

Some time after the committal of the robbery a number of the missing coins were discovered in the Seine, but the bulk of them are still missing.

Going back to times more remote, it is marvelous how many artistic treasures yet remain to be found. Where, for example, does that Gnidian Venus lie hidden, the matchless handiwork of Praxiteles, with which a certain susceptible youth was so stricken that he lost his very senses for love of the cold, beautiful marble? We have recovered scores of other Greek statues, many of more ancient date even; but this, the most famous, is still missing.

Is that copper globe in existence anywhere, sixteen feet in diameter, which was once shown at Gotthorp? Ten people, we are told, could get inside and survey the motions of the heavenly bodies projected in some manner within it.

And what has become of the embossed silver sphere, "so big and heavy that sixteen men could scarce carry it," which was sent by the Emperor Ferdinand as a present to the Sultan Solyman?

Where is the mechanical golden eagle, fashioned by Regiomontanus, of Nuremburg, which flew to meet and salute the Emperor Maximilian, and then returned to await his entry at the city gate; and the iron fly, made by the same clever artificer, which would flutter about the room and then settle on its master's shoulder?

Raphael, it is known, wrote a hundred sonnets, inscribing them on vellum with his own hand. Dying at thirty-three, the great artist left the precious volume, as his most cherished possession, to Guido Reni, his pupil and friend.

By him it was bequeathed to the city of Bologna, where it unaccountably vanished. That one small book, if it could be found today, would be worth a king's ransom.

Recent explorers have recovered the seal of Uzziah, deep down in the foundations of Jerusalem. But that vastly more sacred relic, the seal of Solomon, about which the "Arabian Nights" and the "Talmud" tell such wonderful tales, still remains to be found.

And, lastly, where is the seven-branched candlestick of the Jewish temple, which we know for certain was brought to Rome by Titus. One account says that it was cast over the Milvain bridge into the turbid waters of the Tiber; and, if this were so, it may possibly be recovered when the draining and dredging operations, which are to be shortly undertaken for the recovery of the vast amount of treasure known to be buried in the river's bed, are inaugurated.

This may seem a fanciful supposition. Yet it is not so in reality. Things much less durable than a massive candelabra of solid gold, have come to light after a much longer interval of time.

For instance, six centuries before Christ, Amasis, King of Egypt, sent his portrait to the Greeks established at Cyrene. It was a full-faced likeness, painted upon a panel. More than 2400 years afterward—in 1836, to be precise—this identical picture was found upon a mummy unrolled at Paris.

They risk all their eggs in one basket when they are not in a position to watch or control it.

They think it will be time enough to begin to save for a rainy day when the rainy day comes.

How Jim Found Himself.

THE STORY OF A DECAPITATED RACER TOLD FOR THE BOYS.

By a Special Contributor.

GOLDEN-HEAD stuffed the last bit of his cooky into his mouth as he jumped off the kitchen step, brushed a crumb from his little blue blouse, pushed his polo cap further back upon his curly head and stared wistfully across the tall callas, a long row of which marked the boundary line between Mamma's garden and Dr. Fanning's back yard. The little boy's eyes were fastened upon Billy Fanning, who just then pranced around the corner of the house upon his mettlesome steed, Jim. Jim had a fine head, his nostrils were red and fiery, and his mane, the little there was of it, was long and silky; but his abbreviated neck was fastened with a strong piece of twine upon the end of a battered broomstick. There was a deep notch under the mane and the split beginning of a shoulder, showing that the head had originally belonged to a fine horse, the broomstick being a late addition made by rather unskillful fingers. But to a boy of vivid imagination, who kept his eyes upon the finely-formed head, and who held the bridle reins firmly, the lack of a body was easily forgotten.

Billy Fanning cut the air sharply with his whip and cantered around the rockery, keeping his weather eye open toward the calla hedge, where Golden-head now stood, calling, in his fresh little voice:

"Elloa! Billy, Elloa!"

"Hello yourself!" replied the young horseman, bringing up his steed with flying mane close to the hedge.

Billy Fanning was a handsome little chap, his color was rich and warm, his dark eyes big and shining. He was a little older than Golden-head, and much more robust. He rode Jim at a rapid gait and found some trouble in stopping him just in front of the little gap in the callas, where Golden-head stood.

"This horse has too much spirit," he said, after a loud "whoa!" and a strong pull at the reins.

"Tan't you take it off?" asked Golden-head.

"Ho! Ho! take it off!" laughed Billy, "why you can't take off spirit; it's inside."

"Oh," returned the other child; "I fink he eats it."

"You're a silly," said Billy Fanning; "you don't know anything about a horse."

"I know how to wide," returned Golden-head. "I wish I could wide Jim."

"He's my horse," returned the boy on the other side of the hedge. "He's my horse; nobody can ride my horse."

"I like him so much!" sighed Golden-head. "I like his big eyes and his wed nose."

"I like him, too," remarked Billy calmly.

Golden-head's eyes grew more wistful. He thrust his hands deep into his little pockets, and his fingers, coming in contact with the shining nickel Uncle Jack had given him that week, brought sudden inspiration.

"Why, Billy!" he cried, "I could buy Jim."

Billy's eyes grew speculative. He lifted the flowing mane and looked at the deep notch in the neck, he fingered the split piece of shoulder, he glanced behind at the battered broomstick.

"How much 'ud you give?" he asked warily.

Golden-head answered eagerly:

"Why, my nickel, my new, shining nickel."

Billy shook his head.

"And a tooky," cried the other.

"Not enough," said the little trader shortly.

"Golden-head's eyes grew big with excitement. I'll div my rubber ball, my puzzle, and——" desperately, as Billy's face showed signs of weakening—"my chu chu car."

"Go get um," commanded Bill with decision.

The buyer turned and fled. He stumbled up the kitchen steps, he banged the screen door behind him. He did not even hear Bridget, who called after him: "Is it the misthress as is wantin' yez, darlint?"

On he sped through dining-room and hall, finding the puzzle and chu chu car in breathless haste; but the rubber ball was not in sight.

"Oh, my wubber ball! I tan't find my wubber ball!" he cried, while tears of vexation filled his eyes; but suddenly he spied it. It was a pretty pink ball, the ball of which "Lady Macbeth," his dear little black kitten, was so fond.

The child felt a lump rise in his throat when his eyes fell upon the object of his search, for "Lady Macbeth" had fallen asleep upon the rug in Mamma's room, with her little black paws curled around the ball. She had been chasing it until quite tired out.

"Poor Lady Macbef," murmured the little fellow as he took the ball. The kitten stirred, rose, arched her little back and rubbed herself against the legs of her young master.

"I must det you somfin else, you tunnin' fing," he said, but he took the ball and stoutly thrust it in the pocket of the blue blouse, and then rushed out of the room.

"Bidget," he cried, as he flew through the kitchen again, "I want dust one more tooky."

"Sure, darlint; it's aisy to take 'im," said Bridget.

"Only dust one," and seizing the cake, Golden-head ran on, the puzzle and the chu chu car held tight in his arms. Breathless, he reached the hedge where Billy Fanning stood holding the impatient Jim, just on the verge of a stampede.

Golden-head put down the chu chu car, and the fuzzle. He laid the pretty pink ball beside them with the cooky, and then, fishing deep in his pocket, he drew out the nickel. Reaching this through the hedge, he said, with a slight tremor in his voice:

"Now, Billy, now, tan I have Jim?"

Billy Fanning broke ruthlessly through the callas, two of which lay broken, their waxen cups falling across the chu chu car. Neither of the boys, however, saw this. Billy surrendered Jim without a word. He stuffed the nickel loftily in his pocket. The cooky disappeared in a twinkling, the ball he tossed two or three times high in the air, and then he turned his attention to the other things. He had long wanted the puzzle and the chu chu car—why, the chu chu car was the envy of every little boy in the neighborhood.

Golden-head took Jim, trembling with delight, and, mounting the broomstick, he galloped around the yard in a state of rapture.

No one knew just where Jim had come from. There was no pedigree to look up. There was a dark rumor that he had been rescued from the rag sack and bottle man by one of the larger boys on the hill, but he had, since then, become a hill institution. No one could tell the number of times he had been bought, sold, given away and traded for by his numerous owners. Since he had been in the possession of Billy Fanning, who had given his kite at the close of the last season to a smaller boy for him, he had been the acme of Golden-head's desire. The little fellow had never dreamed of owning him, his highest ambition had been to ride him. This, however, Billy Fanning had resolutely refused to allow. In most things he was a generous little boy, but to lend his horse to another boy seemed to him a proposition not to be considered at all. He stoutly refused to give any reason; from his first ownership he had said: "Jim is my horse; nobody can ride my horse," and this had settled the matter for every boy on the hill.

But time and possession had made Jim less valuable to his owner, who was each day outgrowing the battered broomstick, and this morning the trade had seemed all that could be desired.

Both of the children were very happy. Billy sat down on the cement walk and arranged the puzzle. Later, he drew the chu chu car backward and forward. Occasionally Golden-head stopped in his mad career around the yard, to show him how to keep the car in equilibrium, it having a tendency to lop over on one side in the most exciting moment of a rapid run.

All morning the children played in the sunshine. It was high noon when Billy Fanning crossed the hedge again. He held his new possessions tight in his arms as he wriggled through the gap in the callas, and Golden-head watched him disappear across his own threshold; then, turning, he saw Mamma, who had been downtown all morning, standing in the kitchen doorway. With a cry of delight the little boy flew up the steps, dragging Jim by the bridle rein. Throwing himself in Mamma's arms, he exclaimed: "Jim is mine, Jim's all mine now, Mamma; I've dived my fin's for him, and bof Billy and I are satisfied."

Golden-head and Mamma lived alone, save for Bridget, the maid. Mamma was a school teacher. In the same building where she taught in the grammar grade, was the kindergarten where Golden-head went every morning, so that she could see her little boy to and from school each day. But there was no school, the morning of the horse trade; it took place upon Saturday, and Jim's new master spent the entire afternoon in the saddle. In the evening, his steed was carefully stabled in the corner. When he retired, he took his little black kitten in his arms and climbed into bed, saying: "Poor Lady Macbef! Poor little fing! I must det you somefin' else to play wiv." Later, when Mamma came to kiss him good night and to take away the kitten, the child murmured:

"Poor little Lady Macbef! Poor little fing!"

Monday morning Golden-head rode proudly upon Jim, beside Mamma, to school. The head attracted much attention among Mamma's older boys. Golden-head was repeatedly asked the details of the trade.

"So Billy Fanning got your puzzle and your chu chu car, did he?" asked Chunky, a boy whose burly figure had given him this title.

"Yes," said the child, with an enchanting smile, "and I dot Jim."

"Give him anything else?" demanded Chunky.

"A nickel and Lady Macbef's ball—no—not anyfin' else."

Chunky dug his toe reflectively in the gravel. "And you like the old head?"

"I dess I do," answered the little boy. "I like Jim so awful much, touse he has spirit, you know. It's inside," he added, in explanation, "but Billy Fanning don't fink he eats it."

Chunky laughed long and loud, and so did his companions who were in the vicinity.

At noon, when Mamma came out of the schoolhouse, a group of her boys surrounding Golden-head attracted her attention. They were all talking at once, and excited words reached her ears as she walked towards the little crowd.

"You couldn't do it!"

"I'll bet you, I could."

"Aw, what yer givin' us?"

"I tell you, I know I could."

"Well, how?"

"Why, with screws, or glue, or something. I know I could do it."

"Well, fire away!" cried several voices as Mamma approached.

"What is it, boys?"

"Why, look here, Mrs. Enderson," exclaimed Sherman Fay, one of the oldest of her class. "I've got a scheme." He was holding Jim up and examining the head with close scrutiny. "I was just telling the boys I could fix this thing up and make Golden-head a fine horse."

"How fix it up?" asked Mamma.

"Easy enough," replied Sherman. "In our attic at home is a rocking-horse. It has no head, been split off some way;" he held the head higher and added earnestly: "I just believe I could whittle her down and fit her on that horse."

"Whittle her down?" echoed Mamma faintly.

"Yep," said Chunky, "whittle her down and glue her on. The boys all say he can't do it, but Sherm, he knows what he is talking about."

"How odd for you to have a rocking-horse without a head," said Mamma.

Sherman laughed. "It is odd, but it's been up in the attic ever since we took the house; it's an old thing, left there by somebody, we don't know who. The first I [illegible] added, "I never thought anything about it until I saw Golden-head prancing around on that old broomstick this morning, but suddenly that headless thing loomed up before me, and it struck me I could put the two things and make a good horse.

"Now, Mrs. Enderson, I want you and Golden-head to stay here while I run home and get that body."

"Aw, yes, let him go," cried the boys.

"Oh, go on, Mrs. Enderson," exclaimed Chunky. "She knows a thing or two—go on."

"But your mother," said Mamma. "Maybe she will not be willing."

"Oh, I'll ask mother, of course," exclaimed Sherman. "I know she won't care; it's no use to us."

"Please let him, do, Mamma," pleaded Golden-head, "and please let him fittle her down."

All the boys shouted at this, but they looked at Mamma eagerly.

"Aw, go on, Mrs. Enderson, go on; he won't be long," said Chunky.

"Well, go, dear," exclaimed Mamma at last. "But come back as soon as you can."

Sherman flew off like a rocket.

The boys went into the schoolhouse for a scheme for glue, etc. Mamma and the others sat down on benches under the pepper trees, and the boys began to relate stories of the many trades and swaps that had been made by various younger brothers for Jim, during the season.

"I just tell you what," Chunky declared, "I've traded there head all over this here neighborhood. Why, my little brother Tom—why Tom he bought and sold that thing four times, last summer.

"Oh, kids like that head," explained Dad, "because cause he always looked out for the rights of the horse on the playground; "kids like that head because it's a good thing. It's really like a horse; it has all been upon a fine body."

Golden-head meantime was hovering around on top of the hill; his cheeks were scarlet, his eyes bright with expectation, and he occasionally came to the group and asked anxiously who was "going to fix it down."

A loud "Hooray!" from the child shortly announced man's reappearance, and the shout was echoed by the whole group of boys, as he came panting up the hill, bearing a fine rocking-horse upon his shoulders.

The shouts died out and dead silence prevailed while burden was placed upon the ground; and all gathered around it. A strong suspicion was growing in each mind, even Mamma began to feel the thrill that pervaded the circle. Dad had removed the twine, freeing the head from the battered broomstick, Chunky had his knife in preparatory to the process of "whittling her down," the boy held a bottle of glue, another the screw-driver, each eye was fixed upon the body. It was indeed handsome, had real skin, a long, flowing tail, and the little saddle was a beautiful piece of workmanship; in short, the animal was perfect, save that it had no head.

Dad parted the mane from the broken neck, and [illegible] less excitement pervaded the group, as Sherman fitted the head and fitted it against the break. The [illegible] found its place, the split piece of shoulder fitted into position, and save for the crack that was [illegible] to the eye, the animal was perfect. As it became to every one that the horse and head belonged to each other, a loud shout broke the silence, and a din became a deafening yell, while caps were thrown in the air in wild abandon.

The boys fitted carefully; there was no need of "whittling her down," a few screws did the work, and a fine animal was presented to the delighted Mamma drew a deep breath of astonishment, [illegible] danced around in excitement, and Golden-head pale with delight and happiness, he hardly knew except that the animal was so beautiful.

The screwing of the parts together was but the [illegible] a few minutes. Chunky and Dad did the work, Sherman superintending amid a perfect babel of sound, babel of excited wonder over Jim's finding his body, which had been stabled in the Fay attic all that he had been wandering independently over the [illegible] borhood.

It was not long before a procession came down the [illegible] Sherman led, with Jim, in his entirety, borne high on shoulders in triumph.

Golden-head trudged beside him, stoutly trailing the tered broomstick. Mamma and the boys brought the rear, the latter rubbering at the horse and digging as to his possible ownership before he parted with head.

Sherman turned with Jim so his big glass eyes down, with seeming intelligence, upon his many ers.

"Funny," said Sherman, "how the ghostly form thing loomed up on my mental horizon the instant Golden-head prancing around the schoolhouse yesterday morning. Even then, though, I did not connect the as one, but when I set the body down among the took the head from Chunky, I'll be jiggered if I come over me like a flash that they belonged other."

Upon the veranda of Mamma's house the horse placed, and Golden-head climbed up into the saddle, holding the reins tight in his little hands, took his in a state of bliss too deep for utterance.

The boys sat around, expressing their satisfaction noisy speech that could be heard by all the neighborhood generally.

Billy Fanning, hearing the excitement, came over the lawn.

"Why! What! How! Where did you get him?" gasped.

"Sherman Say sound him, and he'll be jiggered didn't know they belonged to each ofer. It's my Billy, but you may wide him," said Golden-head.

Orthodoxy's Joke.

...It will perhaps be remembered by students of political ...conditions in the United States that, during the cam-

...of eight speeches for the Republican party. The scene for ...one of these talks was at the Tabernacle in Peoria.

...here he was received by an extraordinary concourse of

On the evening of his arrival Col. Ingersoll was, in company with Judge M. M. Bassett, proceeding to the home of an old friend, where they were expected to dine. On their arrival they were enthusiastically greeted on the veranda by a small dog belonging to the household. This dog was remarkable for its utter lack of all points which would appeal to a fancier, its ancestry being apparently part pug and the rest cur. Its value rested in its joyous bark and the facility with which it wagged a ridiculous tail.

The party was watching the antics of the dog in amusement, when Judge Bassett facetiously asked, "What breed is Nip?" "Nip!" replied Col. Ingersoll, forestalling his host, "Why, Nip is hybrid!"

This Perplexing Language.

HERR GEORGE STEINMETZ is an author-publisher of recognized position in Switzerland. In 1902 he made a tour of the United States for the purpose of studying geological formations in the Rocky Mountains for his forthcoming scientific work. Mr. Steinmetz speaks English very well, but with that slight stilted intonation which proclaims that the source of his ability was not residence in an English-speaking country.

He stopped for a time at the Montezuma Hotel at Las Vegas Hot Springs, New Mexico, which is a large hostelry owned by the Santa Fé Railway. The hotel is superbly situated on an eminence commanding a glorious view of the Gallinas Cañon and the distant mountains. A zigzag path, after the fashion of a burro trail, leads from the top of the foothill to the depot, the hill being far too steep to permit of a direct walk. At intervals, to protect the jealously-guarded blue grass, which is as scarce in New Mexico as cactus in Kentucky, the management has placed signs, which read "Use the walks." "Use the walks!"

Mr. Steinmetz joined Dr. Bergmanns, the resident physician, in a walk, and proceeding down the mountain, remarked: "I see that you advise your patients to walk a great deal." "Why, no," replied the doctor, "I do not give that advice promiscuously. Where did you get that idea?" A light dawned on his mind as his companion rejoined: "Well, why then all these signs, 'Use the walks.' 'Use the walks!'"

Plymouth Rock.

"DURING one of my visits through the country districts," said the professor, "I happened to reach a small village where they were to have a flag-raising at the schoolhouse. After the banner had been 'flung to the breeze' there was an exhibition of drawings which the pupils had made, and of the work they had done during the year.

"The teacher recited to them the landing of the Pilgrims, and after she had finished, she requested each pupil to try to draw from his or her imagination a picture of Plymouth Rock.

"Most of them went to work at once, but one little fellow hesitated and at length raised his hand.

"'Well, Willie, what is it?' asked the teacher.

It Smoked Afterward.

OF Robert M. McLane, the Mayor of the devastated city of Baltimore, Mayor Brenton of Des Moines said the other day:

"McLane brings the strictest business methods to bear upon the governing of Baltimore. The city, under his rule, is a big business, and every city employé must do his work—every cent must be accounted for—the same as in a big business.

"Here is a story, remarkably appropriate and striking since the fire, that I heard about McLane last month:

"A number of bills were brought to him one afternoon for approval. They were bills for municipal expenses—the kind of bills that are bunched in most cities under the head of 'sundries and incidentals,' but McLane requires that they be itemized.

"One item on these bills was for cigars, and McLane drew his pen through it. Then, opposite it, he wrote:

"'The city of Baltimore does not smoke.'"

A Newsboy's Geology.

THE late Henry W. Oliver, the Pittsburgh capitalist, took a profound interest in the children of the poor. Hence his gift to Pittsburgh of a magnificent public bath, and hence his frequent and friendly conversations with newsboys, bootblacks and messenger boys.

It is said of Mr. Oliver that one day, after buying a paper from a very little chap, he thought he would test the lad's intelligence by putting a few questions to him. Accordingly he pointed to a pile of paving stones and said:

"How were these stones made, son?"

"They wasn't made. They growed," replied the boy.

"'Growed?' How do you mean 'growed?'" said Mr. Oliver.

"They growed the same as potatoes grow," the boy explained.

Mr. Oliver shook his head. "No, my lad, you are wrong," he said. "Stones can't grow. If you were to come back to these stones five years, or ten years, or twenty years from now, they would still be the same size."

"Of course," said the little newsboy, sneering. "They've been taken out o' the ground now, and have stopped growin'—same as potatoes would."

A Finger in the Pie.

DR. PERKINS-CARTER of Cleveland, who was Senator Mark Hanna's physician, told on a day when his patient's prospects seemed unusually bright, a story about Mr. Hanna and an English waiter.

"In London, one day," he said, "Mr. Hanna visited a very old and quaint chop house on the Strand. Here the meat is all wheeled raw to you on a handcart, and you choose from the cart the steak or the chop or the joint that you desire to have cooked.

"Well, Mr. Hanna took a chop, and then he ordered a piece of game pie. The waiter was a careless, slovenly fellow, and Mr. Hanna said to him, after the pie was brought:

"'What is this mark on my pie, waiter?'

"The man bent down over the pie and examined the mark. Then he answered jauntily:

"'That mark, sir? That is the print of my thumb, sir; just had my thumb in the chocolate I served to the guest over there, sir. Cut it out for you, sir?'"

"There was an ignorant man," he said, "who once applied to Lincoln for the post of doorkeeper to the House. This man had no right to ask Lincoln for anything. It was necessary to repulse him. But Lincoln repulsed him gently and whimsically, without hurting his feelings, in this way:

"'So you want to be doorkeeper to the House, eh?'

"'Yes, Mr. President.'

"'Well, have you ever been a doorkeeper? Have you ever had any experience of doorkeeping?'

"'Well, no—no actual experience, sir.'

"'Any theoretical experience? Any instructions in the duties and ethics of doorkeeping?'

"'Umh—no.'

"'Have you ever attended lectures on doorkeeping?'

"'Have you conversed with anyone who has read such a book?'

STORIES OF PLOT AND COUNTER-PLOT IN THE OFFICIAL WORLD.

From Cassell's Journal.

Chapter I.—The Comtesse's Chauffeur.

"FASTER, Monsieur! Still faster, I beseech you! We have only twenty short minutes, and we are still miles from the frontier!"

Three miles of road lay between the magnificently-equipped, but sadly-smeared, motor and the inn where, twenty minutes hence, Herr Posener and Lieut. Dugré were due to meet and exchange secret papers that would be welcomed by their respective governments.

So much Essington had known for two days; to glean such particulars of the transaction as should enable him to grapple with it after his own desire, he had contrived to act as chauffeur to the Comtesse de Lastrelle when that enlightened young lady had set out to restrain her lover from his folly.

And now only three miles separated the motor and the inn; but to cross the frontier by the road meant exposing themselves to certain delay at the hands of prying customs officers, a point that Essington emphasized in his reply to the impatient Countess.

"Then we must get off the road," she declared. "It is imperative! You understand, Monsieur? Ah, but you do! And you are English! You are bold and daring and resourceful! You will get the motor to the rendezvous in time? It is imperative! Imperative! Money—— Ah, but you are not to be tempted by money. A woman's entreaty—a man's honor! They are more to you than money! You will listen to the one and save the other? You will! For have you not promised? And is it not your countryman's boast that he never goes back upon his word? You hear me, sir? You remember?"

"Madame," interrupted Essington, "I remember! Sit tight! We are going to do the only thing possible—take a short cut!"

He knew the country intimately. The cut across the fields that, but for a running stream, was open to the passage of a powerful motor, would avoid the challenge of the customs officers, and the ensuing delay. Moreover, the cross-country cut had been in Essington's mind since he had discovered that the Countess would only part with the details of her lover's treachery under pressure of circumstances.

So the huge, panting automobile ground a way through a dilapidated fence and was soon heading straight for the gap that marked the streamlet's course and the thickly-wooded country beyond.

"The car must take it in her stride!" shouted Essington. "Hold tight! The moment is coming!"

His words were still ringing in the Countess's brain when the motor dashed at the streamlet's low bank, quivered for a tumultuous moment as it struck, and rebelled against the impediment, then rose to the bank like a horse at a gate, and—up!—on!—down!—crash!

Upon hard ground the motor, rising and falling after its violent impact with the raised bank, might have cleared the ditch that held the trickling stream; but the banks were soft, and as the car fell, the wheels dug into the muddy earth and, for the fraction of a minute, refused to revolve, so that the motor flung its two occupants into the field and wrecked itself in the ditch it had failed to negotiate.

From Essington's point of view—seeing that he had decided upon the necessity for an "accident"—the outcome could not have been happier.

The car was wrecked beyond all hope of present use, and the Countess was only shaken and hysterically frightened, while he himself was comparatively untouched. He hastily consulted his watch.

"It is sixteen minutes to the appointed hour," he said, "and we are at least two and a half miles from the inn in the wood. I could run the distance in fourteen minutes. I could still be in time—if Madame would honor me with her commands and instructions."

The impossibility of her reaching the scene of her lover's downfall in time to save him from the accomplishment of his treachery burst upon the love-stricken woman and forced her to tears and the necessity of confession.

"Monsieur," she cried; "what do I owe you? Go, Monsieur! In the name of mercy, save my poor Henri from disgrace. Ah, but you are innocent of what is expected of you! Listen, Monsieur! Henri—Lieut. Dugré—no, no! It is not Henri's fault! It is the blame of those who tempt the young and honorable from the paths of——"

"The moments are very precious, Madame," interrupted Essington.

"Ah, but you English are so cool, so resourceful! But how shall I tell you of my Henri's wickedness? France has recently pigeon-holed a new scheme for the invasion of England and the discomfiture of Germany. But not for use, Monsieur. You will understand that it is but an academic exercise of military ingenuity which must be encouraged in young officers. France is England's friend! England is—— But you are right. The time flies. Henri—M. Dugré—holds the French scheme for an invasion of England, and would barter it with this Herr Posener, who holds a German scheme for the invasion of your poor country, to the confusion of France. And, Monsieur——"

"They would exchange!" smiled Essington. "Each would steal for his country his neighbor's scheme for the destruction of my helpless people! Madame, I understand you perfectly. On no account must Lieut. Dugré be permitted to complete his bargain with the German. The French scheme must not pass into Herr Posener's hands. Lieut. Dugré's erring honor must be saved at any cost. Madame, I trust to return to you on the wings of victory!"

And, free of the Countess's secret, Robert Essington swung about, and, with the long, springy stride of the practiced athlete, ran in the direction of the inn where the cunning Herr Posener and the treacherous Dugré were about to make a perfidious exchange—for their own gain or advancement.

Chapter II.—"First Catch Your Geese—"

The "Inn in the Wood" was a lonely hostelry correctly described on its signboard. Its greatest pretension was the fact that the boundary line between France and Germany ran clean through it.

More to the point, so far as Essington was concerned, was the fact that the innkeeper's daughter, pretty Margot, was well known to him.

She stood at the back door when Essington, running like the wind, circled the hostelry and burst upon her vision, and at the first glance she thought that Pierre, her wayward lover, had returned to her true and constant heart; then she recognized the caution-signaling Englishman.

"You have brought him, M'sieu?" she eagerly whispered. "Ah, but you have brought my Pierre as you promised when last we met?"

Essington's conscience gave him a twinge, but it was no time for playing second fiddle to a lie. He had encountered Pierre in Paris, and in interfering, for Margot's sake, to stop the fellow's career of roguery, he had been inadvertently instrumental in getting him a term of imprisonment, for which Pierre had vowed vengeance on his release.

"So!" mumured Essington. "You remember that I promised to bring your lover back to you? Well, wait but a few minutes and you shall see how well I have kept my promise. But for heaven's sake, Margot, don't give way to any feminine antics. This is no time for falling upon necks and weeping. It is still in my power to send your long-lost lover to the other end of the earth—for good. You understand me? Then listen, keep cool, and do exactly as I bid you."

Margot's dancing eyes promised anything. Essington's ready hand could not have encountered a readier instrument.

"Two travelers have just called," he whispered.

"Ten minutes since, M'sieu."

"In which room do they now sit?"

"The room upstairs, with the side window overlooking the forest."

"Good. Where is your father?"

"In the fields at work."

"Good again. Go round to the front door and wait. In a few minutes you will hear the clatter of a falling ladder. One minute later give voice to a shriek as though you were being attacked by robbers, then scream and scuffle as though you were trying to keep them at bay. Shout aloud that there is no person in the house. Deny the presence of any traveler or stranger! Do you understand? Do you remember?"

"Yes, M'sieu. And Pierre?"

"Oh—why, Pierre will come as soon as you have done as I have directed. The louder you scream the sooner Pierre will come to you!"

"M'sieu! M'sieu! How can I thank you? How can my Pierre——"

"Hush!" commanded Essington. "Begone!"

On the wings of love Margot tripped round to the front of the inn, and Essington crept to a near-by shed, drew forth a rickety ladder, carried it to the side of the inn that adjoined the forest, lifted it upon a bench to increase its length and hoisted it against the wall beside a casement window that stood slightly ajar.

Then he listened. A guttural voice, answered by smooth, limpid tones, assured him that the occupants of the room were those he sought, and, girding himself for what, he realized, might easily be his last effort on earth, he crept up the ladder till his feet were higher than the casement, gripped the low, sloping roof, planted his off foot upon the topmost rung of the ladder and stole his near foot forward, till, with a quick movement of the toes, he jerked wide open the casement window.

At the next thought he had raised his foot again and, bringing it down, with his utmost effort, upon the swinging casement, the crazy old hinges snapped asunder, and the window fell clatteringly to the ground.

But the effort had dislodged the ladder, which began to slide towards the damaged window. That was Essington's opportunity. Following the ladder until it slipped before the window, he clutched at the eaves, swung clear for one pulsating moment, then kicked his legs through the opening where the window had previously blocked the way.

Even then his long body must have overbalanced his legs, and precipitated him backwards to the ground, had not the two occupants of the room, startled into action, reached the window and, seizing the intruder's legs, pulled him forcibly into the room, where he lay huddled on the floor, a French and a German revolver looking down his panting throat.

"Don't shoot, gentlemen," he begged. "I am a friend. I come to warn you of grave danger. The inn is surrounded. Soon—almost at once—the inn will be searched for stolen documents that are missing from——"

"You hound!" gasped Posener. "You are a spy yourself! Confess it, or I will shoot you where you lie!"

"Ask Lieut. Dugré!" boldly denied Essington. "Yet, why should he recognize me since I am only the man who drives the automobile of Madame La Comtesse de Lastrelle! Ah, now you recognize me!" he added quickly, as Dugré colored crimson at the Countess's name.

"It is a lie! I do not know you!" declared Dugré.

"But I come from Madame the Comtesse! I drove her here—or nearly here—for the car, alas! came to grief in a ditch and Madame—ah, poor Madame!"

"The Countess!" eagerly interrupted Dugré. "She is not hurt? She is not——"

"In body she is not much injured; but in mind, Lieutenant—oh, Madame's agony is sad to witness. Madame was rushing here to warn you of your danger. She had heard that spies were on your shadow, and we drove with frantic haste. Eugh! but the pace was madness. For Madame was mad—mad with terror lest she should arrive too late to rescue the man she loves. Two miles and a half from here, M. le Lieutenant, I left Madame in a ditch. She is there now, for she knows not the way. Do you doubt me? Then come and see with your own eyes. I doubt——"

A piercing scream rang through the old inn.

"Ah! They are coming! That is Margot, the landlord's daughter, who would die for me!" cried Essington. "But how can she keep out the French and German soldiers, who, led by the spies, have come to arrest us? Cannot you hear her struggling? She is a woman—a strong and noble girl—but only a girl! Go! Save her! If you value your freedom—as you love and honor your wife or sweetheart—let me assist you!"

"How?" demanded the bewildered Posener, as Essington pocketed their papers.

"There is a secret room in this old inn. I know it. It is on this floor. Will you come? But in heaven's name gather up your papers. Leave nothing behind for the hounds to scent. Margot vows you are not here. You hear her brave denial! Quick! Follow me! Swiftly and silently!"

To the accompaniment of Margot's realistic struggles Essington had sprung to his feet and crossed the room, now turned the key, and as he cautiously opened the door and peered through, Margot's voice, in a shrill crescendo of verbal struggle with those who sought to accost her, seemed to put the touch of verisimilitude to his story.

"Follow!" he whispered; and Herr Posener, with Lieut. Dugré hugging his back, crept behind him down the corridor.

At the end, where the wall blocked further progress, Essington flung back the door of a windowless cupboard.

"Hasten!" he entreated. "The hounds cannot search here! The search will soon be over, and then——"

Entering himself, he held the door while his companions passed into the empty chamber.

"Strike a match, one of you!" he begged. "Then—" a spring lock. We must close it securely, or——"

In eager response, Posener and Dugré lit matches, and at that moment Essington leaped into the corridor, banged the door behind him with a swing, and barricaded it with a heavy oak settle that was handy, and that, wedged endwise between door and floor, held the former fast and firm.

"First catch your geese," he muttered to himself, "then pluck them. Now for the plucking!"

Chapter III.—The Plucking—and After.

Margot had ceased to simulate the struggle she had made and stood at the foot of the stairs, listening.

Essington gave his victims time to hurl themselves against the door, and realize generally that the chances of forcing an escape was nil, before he addressed them.

"Gentlemen," he said, "my name is Essington. I am an Englishman, and I will trouble you to pass over those documents that, at the moment of my interruption, you were in the act of exchanging.

He paused to allow his words to sink, then added smilingly:

"I give you my word of honor not to use the information in question to your detriment. I am no spy, and I insist that my present action disproves that assertion. I am not in such service as gives me desire or means to use my knowledge of your guilt against yourselves. I trust you sensibly see the virtue in complying with my request. But I am not working in the interests of your country. I solemnly swear never to divulge the source whence I obtained the information that you are now about to pass beneath the door.

"Gentlemen, I await the appearance of the papers for the invasion of England. The door is barricaded, and there is no escape for you else. Push out the papers I demand, and you shall be free in a few minutes later; refuse, and——"

Herr Posener had crept to the door, knelt down, and silently protruded the nose of his revolver through a hole at the bottom where the settle did not touch the floor.

It was so nimbly done that Essington, standing aside for fear of such an assault, received no warning before the German pulled the trigger; then he heard the bullet inches from the floor; a half of the heel of his boot shot away by the faithful bullet, and an ugly pain shooting in his blood-swollen veins.

"Blind idiots!" he cried, between clenched teeth. "You nearly had me. Do you think such terrorism will move you? Bah! I parley with you no longer. Quick! The papers or I fetch those who will know how to deal with their traitors. Do you hear? Posener! Dugré! You speak as if I meant every word I said? Ah, listen, Margot to see who has been shot. Margot, tell the gentlemen how long it will be before your lover will be here. Tell them how Pierre loves traitors! Margot, count loudly up to twelve; for I swear that if I do not push their papers beneath the door, this settle, before you have finished your count, I will call those who will pounce upon them as vultures upon carcass. Begin, Margot! One, two, three! I have left in me. Choose, gentlemen! Your fate is in your hands. Count, Margot! Let them hear your voice and remind them of the tolling bell!"

Margot began to count, but she had only reached when paper rustled beneath the door, and a long envelope, fat and precious, squeezed its way through the rat-eaten aperture.

If the lieutenant, with eye and revolver to the crack had hoped to bag his jailer in the act of pouncing the document, he was grievously disappointed; for Essington had found a broom and, covering the crack with the bass end, he drew it towards him, ran his eye over the contents and gleefully demanded the second.

The German was more obstinate, but he yielded when Margot's count, and, at "eleven," he, too, with a curse pushed out the scheme that he had acquired at such and no little bribery.

"Gentlemen," said Essington, "I thank you. In an hour from now Margot will open the door and—remember that an Englishman keeps his word of honor. You is in safe hands. I wish you farewell!"

"But my Pierre!" cried Margot, as Essington wards the stairs. "If you go, M'sieu Pierre?"

"Dear soul!" murmured Essington. have your Pierre. I will go to him him here to——"

There was a heavy footstep on the voice began to call tremulously a wo

She bounded down the creaking stairs and fell into her lover's arms. Gasping for breath and the power of action, Essington remembered the window in the room that faced the forest, and in breathless haste he crept thither.

Essington flung his legs out of the window, gripped the ledge, dangled, clutched low at a creeping vine, fell to the limit of his reach, and dropped.

Margot was still in her lover's arms, weeping hysterical joy. Essington picked himself up and dashed into the forest.

Three days later, after a circuitous journey, he reached England with the latest French and German plans for the invasion of England, and quite a neat, attractive little story with which to account for his possession of the prizes.

Italian Opera at Home.

A BONNETED AND RESTLESS HOUSE. REVERSAL OF AMERICAN WAYS.

From a Special Correspondent.

FLORENCE (Italy) Feb. 21.—In these Wagnerian days, one seldom hears Italian opera outside its native land. Perhaps the classic hours with Siegfried or the Valkyrie would be too great a strain upon this volatile people. Certain it is that opera-going here is more a social function than an intellectual effort. The Italians know every note, and can hum their opera through, from end to end. It matters little whether they listen or not, and they generally do not trouble to pay attention. An opera must be very effective and wonderfully staged to hold these irrepressible people. First nights are always gala evenings, when nobility in full glory, with blaze of diamonds and rustle of gowns, appears in the boxes.

The Queen's birthday is also a marked event. Elena is very popular with her people, and all day the dull streets were bright with the bunting of every nation, and that evening the gay world repaired to the Royal Theater Pergola, to hear again the old story of impassioned love, in Verdi's "Otello." A rather frisky African, in red kilts and gold chains, flourished about the stage, and after the smothering scene, he rolled from the bed with a backward tumble that sadly endangered his vertebral column. But his tenor was delightful, when one could forget the whites of his eyes and the surrounding gaiety was a comfort to the most critical.

Walter Savage Landor, brave descendent of "Imaginary Conversations," was a delightful host, in the box of Marchese Albizi, which bore impressive coat-of-arms. It was third from the royal box, and aristocracy easily passed in review. Across, was Princess Strozzi, from the grim, great palace. She was a Polish heiress, who brought a mint of money to retrieve the languishing fortunes of the Prince, and thus title and funds made a strong coupling. Near us was Marchesa Rudini, née Labouchere, whose recent wedding was the event of Florence.

In the royal box was the Count of Turin, dignified and elegant, a handsome chap, and very popular. At first interval, the band played the Royal Salute, and the house rose to do him honor, and leveled their glasses in a prolonged stare, which he bore with calm unconcern. He was a most attractive figure, facing the throng in all his bright regalia, covered with cords and orders and medals of high rank. Repeatedly they played to him, and the people broke loose in rounds of applause. As the last note subsided, he escaped to the club box, for a familiar chat with his chums.

Box visiting is a strong feature of the evening, and the man who writes articles soon spied us, armed with his latest effort. He was overwhelmed with his environment, and repeatedly remarked that the beautiful box "would quite easily hold a dozen," till we feared that he would count noses, and run off to corral his impecunious friends in the pit, to complete the dozen. But his was a clear case of "pigs in clover," and he was too rusé to risk losing his seat, so he stayed! and then stayed some more! He had just written about "The Enemies of the Theater," i. e., high hats, and chatterboxes, and to prove his theory he rumbled incessent nothings through two strong acts, to the despair of those who were more interested in the stage than in him. He found his foil in the editor of the Italian Gazette, who, not the least impressed by his surroundings, poised his eyeglass with a blasé air and remarked familiarly on Count This and Prince That in the near boxes.

In general, nothing could be worse managed than the Italian theater. Except in the case of stars like Duse, tickets are not sold earlier than a day before the performance. A play is not announced more than two days in advance, though special attractions are billed "quanto prima," and at the box office we have the same information "in the near future." Advertisements are very obscurely posted, no one ever knows surely when the good things will come, and inquiring a few days later, we learn that they have already been given! The buying of a ticket is a mystery to the uninitiated. Chairs and boxes have a certain price, which does not include the admission. It would seem that we were expected to leap to our seats through the roof or the keyhole, and theater-going is not so cheap as it sounds when we hear simply the price of seats, which at home would mean the sum total. It is a general custom to reserve one's seat without buying the ingresso, and if at the last moment one is unable to go, the loss is not so great. Or one may give away his seat, and the recipient pays his own admission as he enters. This is a novel half way of making a theater present, yet people make no scruple of giving a seat only, and it is the usual Italian method, though foreigners retain their home habit, of a gift in toto. The queer system has its advantages. When a manager has a poor house, he may hand his box keys to friends, saying: "Can you use a box tonight?" and the parties gladly avail themselves of the privilege, and simply pay the entrance, which is never included. Hence there is a mutual gain, a mutual favor. The number in a box is limited only by its capacity for squeeze! It may be packed as tight as it will hold.

In the large theaters, the best boxes are owned. Prince Strozzi owns his box as much as he owns his palace. But the owner often relinquishes his key when he does not wish to use the box. The theaters have no lovely galleries with easy seats. Except for the ground floor, the entire house is divided into boxes, four or five tiers deep, numbered from one end of the stage around the house to the other end of the stage, as No. 1, third row; No. 19, first row. The upper rows are rushed, upon admission tickets. Here the crowds pack like sardines. These boxes are nothing better than black coops, quite dark except for the light which shines from the house, with a few pegs for wraps, and three hard stools which the first arrivals promptly appropriate at the front, while the belated folks press on one's head, standing all the evening, to catch any possible view of the stage. One travels upstairs and downstairs, through blind alleys and tortuous passages, to reach his landing. Fourth and fifth-floor patrons enter by the same street door, and the former must travel first to the top, and pass a gate, and descend to the fourth floor with his little ticket of ten sous extra. Of course if one has the time to wait with the crowd, and is willing to go this way, the cost is very slight. Certain it is, that with a people utterly heedless over trifles, these buildings would be death traps in a panic, and comforting it is that there are never any fires in these rambling old houses of solid stone.

On the ground floor, the parquet is fenced off, and behind the railing stand the crowds who have entered for a franc. The orchestra is now abandoned in the theater, and their place is roped in, and filled with two-franc chairs, where the victims, dropped under the footlights, strain and stretch, to catch the action on the stage above. Eagerly these impecunious ones, often spangled officers and would-be swells, gaze towards the boxes, if perchance they may spy a fair friend, usually a rich American in fine feathers, whom they may bless by an evening's visit. By no possibility could they or would they invite her in good style, but the impoverished gallants pay their entrance, then revel like leeches and parasites, in milady's luxurious box.

The two sisters who settled down for a winter's society frolic find no fish coming to their net, in the good American way. They must pay their own bills for every outing, and generally pay for their swain, if they would have the honor of his company. If the youth sees no friend in a box, he strolls between acts through the parquette, chatting here and there, honoring this one and that with a few moments of his precious life, all in the style of a millionaire. The presumption of the poverty-stricken swell is truly audacious.

Best parquette seats for Zacconi are four francs, ingresso included. Foot stools are 10 sous extra, and nobody ever takes one. The seats are high and hard, of slippery leather, and woe betide the short body whose feet do not reach the floor. Unluckily, the high hat was not banished with the scraping orchestra, and it is the pride of each woman, and the despair of her neighbor. Women seem to attend the theater expressly to show their headgear. They wear double-deckers, and skyscrapers, forests of flowers and foliage, and aviaries of the feathered tribe. The Americans usually live up to the home law, and enter hatless, but we are few among the crowds. Often one thinks of Horace Greeley's witticism, as he sat behind a great creation. "I say, Madam, if anything should happen on the stage, would you kindly let me know."

The theater begins promptly at 8:30, and people come in when they please. Parquette people must enter from little side holes near the stage, and stride up from the front. The tramping of feet, unlocking of boxes, and sliding of doors are often beyond mortal endurance, and the Italians are very peculiar in what they can stand. Each wants to make all the noise he likes, but he will not endure his neighbor's pow-wow. Yet no one offered a hint of resentment to the ill-bred American woman who deliberately talked aloud, sub rosa, disturbing perhaps forty persons, through an entire evening! The "bis" of approval is very like the hiss of censure, and the stranger cannot always distinguish between the two, so it seems as if the people made one continuous row. Usually, a word, a whisper, the tread of late comers, is greeted by a prolonged and stinging hiss, which runs through the house. It rings pitilessly on the offender who breaks the peace at any tragic moment, and heaven help the poor wretch who cannot stifle his cough or sneeze. All Italian fury is let loose upon him, in that composite hiss, which is, of course, far more disturbing than the original noise.

Not least among theater pleasures is the orgy after the play, when our savage, Landor, leads the little Bohemian band to the big bakery, where glow the fires of the raging furnace and where we buy the fresh, crisp rolls and carry them on to the famed Mocca, the one German drinkery in town, where sardines, salmon, caviar, with Munchen and Pilsener form a jolly banquet for the epicure amid dense smoke, long-haired artists and famed musicians.

Hours since, the trams ceased running, and no tenderfoot would dare suggest a cab, so we trudge off in the dark night, the very early morn, winding through narrow alleys, flanked by stately palaces, along the way where Dante lingered, thinking of his Beatrice, where Donatello and Ghilberti made their fame. Great souls have lived and worked in these dark ways—which lead out to the wondrous Loggia and the towering public palace, prison of the great Padre of San Marco. Across the square we pass, into the shadow of the grey Uffiizi, treasure-house of art, and follow up the grey Arno, which darts beneath its arches. A Tramontana, wild and fierce, from the cold snows of distant mountains, blows us across the Ponte Grazie, and the pension gives grateful shelter.

ADAMS FISHER.

A SIWASH STRIKE.

The Siwashes who hunt for market about Sitka, Alaska, have taken a notion to have a hand in the matter of game protection themselves. They say if the government won't let them kill deer to sell any time they want to, then they will not kill deer at all except for their own use. Sitka wondered at the scarcity of venison soon after September 1 last year. There was only the smallest quantity on sale, and at fabulous prices. Sitka began to ask questions, and it developed that the Indian hunters had formed a "union" among themselves and agreed to kill no deer for market in the open season unless they could do the same in the closed season. Sitka argued, then protested, then got down on her knees and offered bright new silver for fresh venison, but the silent Siwash didn't hear, and went on eating clams under his banner, "Kill now, kill all the time." Sitka wept and coaxed, but it did no good. At last accounts she was eating salt salmon, "canned truck," and tough beef shipped in on the hoof from the States. The placid Siwash said never a word and bided his time, feasting on clams.—[Field and Stream.

Our Fight With the Japs.

ALMOST FORGOTTEN ENCOUNTER IN STRAITS OF SHIMONOSEKI.

By a Special Contributor.

PROBABLY few persons in this country, even among the better informed, are aware of the fact that hostilities ever broke out between armed forces of the United States and those of Japan, and in view of the widespread interest and sympathy felt among all classes of our people for the doughty little Japs in their present struggle with the Russians, the hitherto little heralded episode about to be related will prove more or less of a surprise and shock to the sensibilities of the sympathetic American for his trans-Pacific neighbor battling with the hosts of the Great White Czar.

Americans are wont to view the entire period of our relations with Japan, ever since the opening of Japanese ports to the trade and commerce of the civilized world at the behest of the United States, as one of uninterrupted peace, amity and good will, and although any one at all conversant with history is cognizant of the fact that unpleasant incidents and embarrassments attended the intercourse of Americans with the Japanese in the early days of our contact with them, it has probably never occurred to the average person that such had ever led to a clash of arms, in truth, to a bloody battle, between a cruiser of the United States Navy and armed vessels of the Japanese supported by heavy land batteries. That this encounter did actually take place and resulted in the killing and wounding of many men on both sides is but history, albeit little known history.

During the Civil War the cruiser Wyoming, a sister ship of the far-famed Kearsarge, was sent to the Asiatic station to be on the lookout for the Confederate commerce destroyers then operating against the merchant ships of the North, and about the time of her arrival in Japanese waters an edict of the Mikado of Japan had been promulgated expelling foreigners from the Land of the Rising Sun. Her presence was therefore opportune, for at the very moment of her arrival in a Japanese port the passage of the Straits of Shimonoseki, forming the western entrance of the inland sea of Japan and dividing the large islands of Hondo and Kiushiu, were being strongly fortified by the Choshu clansmen, who were thus availing themselves of the opportunity offered by the Emperor's edict to embroil the Mikado in trouble with some foreign power, by firing on ships attempting the passage of the straits. The latter being but three miles long, from one to one and a half miles wide, and the navigable channel but a few hundred feet in width, offered an excellent chance for the clansmen to attain their object of obstructing the passage. The town itself, situated on the straits and known by the same name, has long been called the Gibraltar of the Japanese Mediterranean, and is strongly guarded at the present time by modern fortifications erected by the enterprising Japanese, quick to take advantage of a position of the utmost strategical value. The tide running through these straits has been likened to a mill race, so swift is its current, and the passage is most difficult except at times of slack water.

On the commanding bluffs overlooking the straits, the Japanese erected seven batteries, in the armament of which were 8-inch Dahlgren guns, a present from our own government, and soon to be turned against vessels flying the flag of the donor. Several ships had been purchased and armed to assist the forts, and all was ready for the onslaught upon the first defenseless merchantman which should unsuspectingly poke her nose into the straits. On June 25, 1863, their opportunity arrived. The American steamer Pembroke, en route from Yokohama to Nagasaki, entered the straits and anchored, waiting for slack water before attempting the run through. About midnight the Japanese opened fire from ships and batteries, and the former were seen to be heading toward the Pembroke, apparently with the intention of boarding. The captain of the American ship, realizing the danger into which he had unwittingly run, slipped his cable and made off with all speed.

Whatever pecuniary damage was done was made good by the Tokio government on complaint and demand by the owners of the Pembroke, indemnity to the amount of $10,000 being paid. The insult to the flag, however, was to be atoned for in an entirely different manner. Mere money compensation could not accomplish that. The score must be wiped out in blood. But before this could be effected, the Japs added other sources of international trouble for their government in the attack which was made upon a French dispatch boat attempting the passage of the hitherto peaceful straits. The poor Frenchman fared worse than the Pembroke, as she escaped only in a sinking condition with a much battered hull. A Dutch cruiser, the Medusa, was likewise treated to a hot dose of shot and shell, and quickly got out of range, astonished at the size and weight of the Japanese projectiles and the accuracy and rapidity of their fire.

Exultant now at the success that had attended their hostile efforts, the wily Japs were ready for all comers, but their day of reckoning was at hand. When news of the attack on the Pembroke reached Commander David McDougal of the Wyoming he was under orders to return home with his ship, but this affair determined him in proceeding immediately to the scene of action and having a little try at the Japs himself. Entering the straits, cleared for action, the Wyoming was fired upon, and immediately engaged the Japanese ships and steamed rapidly through the passage, delivering a heavy fire at both the vessels and the fortifications from the then powerful 11-inch Dahlgrens and 32-pounders forming her battery.

At a point where six of the Japanese earthworks and their three vessels could concentrate their entire fire upon her, the Wyoming unfortunately went hard and fast aground, and for a moment defeat for the Americans seemed certain. The powers that decide the fate of battles, however, decreed otherwise, and by reversing engines and after powerful effort the apparently doomed ship was successfully backed out of her predicament and into deep water. Meanwhile the Japanese had not been slow to take advantage of the opportunity thus presented to them, and their fire had been rapid and accurate, while the Lancefield, one of the Japanese steamers, quick to see the favorable chance for ramming, went at the Wyoming full speed with that intention. The Yankee tars now showed the stuff that they were made of, and fought their guns like demons, while the crew of the forward 11-inch pivot barker had the satisfaction of seeing one of their well-aimed shells pierce the side of the Lancefield, tea a great hole in her and pass out on the other side, speeding on toward the town of Shimonoseki, a quarter of a mile distant, where it at last exploded. This shot turned the tide. The Lancefield's boiler had been pierced, she blew up and sank, while her unlucky crew made off for the shore, swimming for their very lives. Another of the Japanese fleet which had been keeping up a destructive fire on the Wyoming was now given attention, and settled by a few well-directed shells which sent her to the bottom.

McDougal was now in a position to devote his entire energies to the shore batteries, and deliberately retraced his course through the straits, keeping up a cannonade that awoke the echoes far and near. The batteries were silenced and their gunners driven from their places, only to return to them when the Wyoming was well out of range, where she came to, giving the gallant commander of the American ship time to count his losses. The action had lasted just one hour and ten minutes, in which time the vessel was struck over twenty times, ten shots having pierced her hull. Her smokestack was riddled, and both fore and mainmasts suffered with a shot in each, while the rigging was badly cut up. The ship had fired fifty-five rounds or nearly one for every minute of the action, and the guns that were so well served were muzzle loaders at that. But the losses to the valiant ship's company was most to be deplored. Six men were killed outright, and four wounded. Such proportionate preponderance of killed over wounded is not often chronicled of naval actions.

Several weeks later a French frigate and gunboat entered the straits, and after landing a detachment of 250 men, captured the batteries from the rear and destroyed them. It is perhaps superfluous to add that the passage of the Straits of Shimonoseki has been unattended with danger to friendly vessels from that day to this.

McDougal displayed the greatest dash and nerve in thus running his vessel into the fierce fire which he knew the Japs had prepared for him. Had the ship been destroyed, disabled, or captured, and the Americans made prisoners, torture would have been their fate. It was immemorial law and custom for the beaten party in Japan to perform harikari, or suicide, by disemboweling with the sword, and failing this to suffer death by decapitation. With this knowledge that practically no quarter would be allowed in the event of capture, it was the purpose of McDougal to blow up the ship and all on board, and the officer in charge of the powder division was instructed to that effect in case of being boarded, made helpless by grounding, or a shot in the boilers.

Overshadowed by the greater events of the Civil War then transpiring, it is not to be wondered at that this encounter should have produced but little impression upon the public mind at the time. The boldness, effectiveness and skill displayed by the Americans, however, and the suddenness of the attack, coupled with its brilliant success, added immensely to the prestige of our navy in the Far East, and counted for much to this country, involved as it was in the life and death struggle for its very existence. These considerations render it deserving of a more honored and prominent place than has thus far been accorded it in the annals of the achievements of the United States. Speaking of the encounter, President Roosevelt, then assistant Secretary of the Navy, is reported to have said: "Had that action occurred at any other time than during the Civil War, its fame would have been echoed all over the world."

TRIVIAL CAUSES OF WAR.

A BROKEN TEAPOT THAT CAUSED THE LOSS OF HALF A MILLION LIVES.

[Tit-Bits:] Nothing is more amazing in the history of nations than the absurdly trivial causes which have been sufficient to let loose the dogs of war and deluge continents in blood.

Enclosed in an iron case in the tower of Modena Cathedral may be seen today a bucket which, 900 years ago, was the innocent cause of a terrible war. Some soldiers of Modena, in a mood of mischief, had stolen the bucket from a public well in Bologna, and refused to give it up on demand. Fights between the soldiers of the rival and jealous States ensued, and from this spark was kindled a fire of war which devastated a large part of Europe and led to the lifelong imprisonment of the King of Sardinia, son of the German Emperor.

A war in China two centuries and a half ago, which involved the loss of half a million lives, [illegible] directly from a broken teapot. The teapot was the treasured possession of a dignitary high in the favor and councils of the Emperor, and when he was traveling through the lawless provinces in the northwest of China some of his retinue, who had fallen behind the main body, were intercepted by a band of robbers, and among the spoil the teapot was found and contemptuously flung on the ground and broken. The matter was reported to the Emperor by the indignant Mandarin, a punitive force was sent out, and a long and terrible war ensued.

Lord Palmerston used to say that only three men had ever known the nature of the troubles in Schleswig-Holstein which led to two great wars—two of them had died before war broke out, and he, the third of the trinity, had completely forgotten what it was all about. It is now well known, however, that a slight manipulation by Bismarck of a telegram set France and Germany flying at each other's throats a generation ago, with results too appalling to contemplate.

The war of the Spanish succession, in which the [illegible] Duke of Marlborough played so conspicuous and brilliant a part, was, it is said, the outcome of a spilt glass of water at a Tuileries ball. One of the court ladies had expressed a wish for a glass of water in the hearing of the British and Spanish Ambassadors, who forthwith hastened to fetch it.

On returning, each holding a tumbler, they found that the fair bird had flown and was dancing with a French statesman; and to crown their discomfiture the English diplomat cannoned against the Spaniard and upset the water he was carrying—an accident which led to an apology and an exchange of courtesies. A trivial, ridiculous incident enough, but it served to inflame jealousies and excitement sympathies and thus to turn the balance in the direction of war.

More absurd still was the cause which may be said to have led to centuries of war between our country and France. In order to please the Archbishop of [illegible] Louis VII of France had consented to remove his beard in common with his subjects, and present a clean-shaven face to the world. It was a disastrous shave, for it led to so much friction with his wife, who resented her husband's changed appearance, that at last the King divorced her to become a few months later the wife of Henry II of England. From this marriage of Henry to the angry, discarded wife of Louis centuries of bloodshed may be said to have followed.

The Seven Years' War was largely due, according to his own confession, to the vanity of Frederick the Great wanting to see his name figure largely in the Gazette. The Indian Mutiny was precipitated by the cartridges served out to the Sepoys, which they believed were greased with the fat of animals unclean alike to Hindu and Mohammedan; and the Turco-Russian war, in the opinion of many Slavonic sands, was started by the blacksmith's hammer with which a Herzegovinian blacksmith killed a tax collector who had insulted his daughter.

Among other ludicrous causes from which wars have sprung are the emptying of a bucket by a Florentine citizen on the head of a man of Milan who was passing underneath the window; and the stealing of a laced petticoat of a Castile lady by a Moor, which, with the vendetta that followed the theft, led to many years of fierce warfare between the Spaniards and the Moors. Borrowing a lighted pipe and failing to return it kindled civil war for years among the rival races in the Pamirs and Afghanistan; a dispute as to the relative attractions of snails and vipers as food gave rise to fifty years of fighting between Milan and Pisa; and it is said two German States fought for years out of rivalry as to their respective powers of beer drinking.

PHYSICAL TRAINING IN JAPAN.

The belief in physical training has really been a matter of quite modern growth in England; but as it was slow to come, it came with a rush. For we seem to have been taken with a positive mania for physical training, as if there is as much danger of our overdoing it as there is of neglecting what we know to be essential to health. Let us take a lesson from the hardy little Jap, who is the embodiment of "wiriness," and who seems incapable of fatigue, though his sustenance is only a few grains of rice. The Japanese have practiced a system of physical exercise for over 2500 years, and to this is due the splendid physique which enables them to withstand fatigue. They have been called the "healthiest, strongest and happiest men and women in the world;" and the credit for this must be given to jiu-jitsu, the system referred to.

There are no less than six different systems of jiu-jitsu, but every one is based on diet and the healthy state of the body. Every muscle is brought into development and hardening by the system, which means "muscle breathing"—a term that does not express the fact. Four years are needed for the full development of the system; years of regular, patient practice, and gradually the pupil begins to feel its influence. The most interesting part of it is which deals with the daily habits of the student of jiu-jitsu.

Twice a day he will bathe, if he would imitate the Japanese teachers; a gallon of pure water will be consumed during the twenty-four hours, and he will eat no meat. Rice comes first in importance as an element of diet; next come vegetables, fish and fruit, meat being scarcely ever used. Fresh air, naturally, is absolutely essential, not only to jiu-jitsu, but to good health and vigor in Japan, as elsewhere, and a special study is made of the influence of deep breathing upon the student.

But what will surprise most people is that something mostly needed beyond all these—equanimity of temper—is essential. The reason of this is that there are too many tricks, which are dangerous to life and limb, to be entrusted to a person whose passions might overpower his judgment.—[London Black and White.

OLD JAPANESE CUSTOMS.

Japanese ladies have been known to do without stockings to maintain the harmony between beautiful French slippers and magnificent French evening dresses. I have been served by a Japanese hosier who did without everything he did not supply himself—he had a shirt, a collar and tie, and scarf pin and studs, but no trousers. And the effect of their absence was heightened by his wearing braces, because he sold them. The Japanese do not kiss—if a Japanese girl knows how to kiss, it shows the work of a foreign instructor; she does it as an accomplishment, not as an enjoyment. The Japanese have no pens and ink, but they make a very good shift with a painting brush. The Japanese houses have no chimneys, and you are never warm enough until the house catches fire. The Japanese have beef and no mutton; the Chinese have mutton and no beef. Japanese bells, like Japanese beetles, have no tongues. Japanese snakes have no poison; Japanese music has no harmony. The Japanese alphabet is not an alphabet, but a selection of seventy useful ideograms to dispense with the thirty thousand in ordinary use by the Chinese.—[Queer Things About Japan.

FERNERIES OUT OF DOORS.

FERN CULTURE IN SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA—A SANTA BARBARA FERNERY.

By Belle Sumner Angier.

NOTE—Queries, properly and clearly stated, addressed to the House Beautiful department in care of The Times, and which relate to floriculture or landscape gardening, architecture or interior decoration, will be answered, so far as possible, either in these columns or by personal letter. Answers will have frequently to be deferred for a week or more.

PLANTING NOTE.

Border plants, heliotropes, verbenas, and in the warmer, dryer localities, carnation plants may now be put in the ground.

Paradise—Before the Rain.

MONTECITO dry was not Montecito in the joy of springtime, with bird songs, and the lush "green things growing." The sweet odors of the magnolia and the orange blossom, and the breath of the wild roses and ferns in the cañon, that I had dreamed of by night and by day during the months of my exile, were missing. It was the first of February, and the trees and the flowering plants alike were holding up their bare hands pleading y to the sky, praying for just one shower of blessing on the thirsty land. I could hear the gray old sycamores fairly groaning in their anguish. I was completely discouraged. I had come from a rainless land to this place of my dreams, hoping to find the luxuriance of growth, the beauty of foliage that I had left behind last May, and I could not endure the sight of the suffering plants.

It seemed as if all the world of green things was writhing, twisting in the anguish of death. The sturdy old oaks alone stood firm, bearded as they are with long, hanging moss, which scarcely serves to cover the great scars made by the hand of man in that other dreadful year of drouth thirty years ago or more, when these same oaks stood between life and death, for the great herds of suffering cattle that then ranged the valley of El Montecito had lived for weeks on the green leaves and branches of the oak trees. Now these grand old warriors lifted their evergreen heads and seemed to say, "Courage, little friends, the rain clouds are gathering, tomorrow we shall have the blessing of God upon us."

I drove into Santa Barbara along the shore, the fog wrapping us close in its embrace. The surf thundered on the shore, and down, deep down in the undertone, I heard the sound of the storm gathering, and it carried my mind far back to the years, those far-away years when I had walked up and down on the beach listening, praying, crying out for the Rain-God to send his messengers down to refresh the land and give to us the strength and health to reap the crops that were perishing by the drouth. Experience is our greatest teacher, memory our best friend, and so, as memory came to my assistance I said to my driver, "The rain came before, it will surely come again," and even as I spoke the fog seemed to condense, and I felt the sweet drops of moisture on my face, and my faith was revived.

The wind blew hard that night, and in my room at the Arlington I could hear the undertone of the surf come up and meet the wild song of the mountain winds. There was a shower in the night, only a shower, and scarcely enough to wet the dust, but it was a token of a promise to me. Next morning there was no sunshine, the wind blew cold, but our hearts were cheerful, for the Barbareños said, "Rain is on the way."

My good friend, Dr. Franceschi, said "Come. I will show you a home and garden that will gladden your heart. A place that is modern, that has had thought and intelligence freely used in its planning." And so, strolling here and there through the older gardens to see the rare examples of tropical trees and shrubs that distinguish every block in old Santa Barbara, we found our way to Belvoir. It is indeed a notable fact that in every dooryard of Santa Barbara may be found rare palms, strange pines and curious shrubs—splendid aliens that here seem to surpass those of their kind to be found in the land of their nativity! To be sure, the long months of drouth had left their mark in places, for, strange as it may seem, no amount of artificial irrigation (and Santa Barbara has excellent water supply and reservoirs,) will keep trees in that splendid freshness of growth which the rain from overhead brings.

Still, Santa Barbara has such a wealth of resource in plant life in every dooryard that there is much of charm to be found, and we two nature-lovers and enthusiasts found plenty of beauty to make us sing praises.

Belvoir and a Model Out-of-door Fernery.

Sola and Quarentina streets had to meet when they arrived at the foot of the hill. "Mission Ridge," I believe, is the official title for the long range of low hills that separates the town of Santa Barbara from the Santa Ynez Mountains, with Mission Cañon lying between. Quarentina street runs straight to Mission Ridge from the ocean, and a lovely bit of seascape one gets from the porches of Belvoir, the charming home of Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Hadley. Mr. Hadley has apparently lost none of the Chicago alertness, vigor and enthusiasm that properly belongs to all men who have had their up-bringing in that progressive city, but Mr. Hadley's energy has been artistically moderated by his world-wide travel, as well as his college life in that grandest of all old colleges, King's College in the university of universities.

Santa Barbara is blessed with a magnificent sandstone that cannot be excelled for building purposes. To be sure, there are so-called artists who groan about the "impossible yellows" in this same building stone. They are not "impossible," because they are there, and to my mind this stone has simply caught the California sunshine, and of all building stone I have ever seen, is the warmest, brightest, most cheerful; and blends so delightfully with the natural surroundings and the colorings of sea, and sky, and mountains, and trees, that I am willing to endure the scorn of these ultra-sensitive colorists if only some way, some how, I may some day have a home, a real sunshiny, lovely California home, whose exterior shall be built of rough-hewn Santa Barbara sandstone with unfinished surface!

Now, one of the great beauties of Belvoir is the free use of of this same stone in the wall surrounding it, the foundation of the house, the pillars of the pergola, the walling up of the "barranca." "Barranca" is the Spanish for—well, it is a small "arroyo," and I suspect that in the English of Montana "a small gulch" would be a free translation.

Every well-made garden must have a plan, and this plan must have some central point or thought which is in a way the predominant note in the song, the key to the whole upbuilding of the place. The "barranca" and the use of it is the "feature" of Belvoir. As one enters the gate of Belvoir there is the broad expanse of green lawn, bordered on the one hand by a walled terrace, overhung with handsome, flowering shrubs, and on the other sloping down to meet the bare ground surrounding a splendid collection (although smaller than some others in Santa Barbara, yet chosen for special beauty and suitability,) of palms, and as we go down the garden walk between them we see that they have cut off from our view, as we approached from the town, the beautiful barranca, with its great live oak tree and the exquisite out-of-door fernery under and about it. The surprise is complete, and mine was accentuated from the fact that I should not have believed, save from the seeing of my own eyes, that such rare and delicate ferns and orchids could be safely grown in the open air. Open, I say, for the shelter was only that of the oak tree overhead and the freedom from draught which was insured by the stone retaining wall on the one hand, and the palms and shrubberies on the other. This "barranca" is so small, and the hills back of it so great, that at certain times there has been a great flow of water through it, draining the hillside above. Several times Mr. Hadley had his ferns, and his pretty fish pond with its aquatics, swept completely away by a deluge from the hillside after a heavy storm. His engineering skill was put to work, with the result that a culvert was built down below and under the pool, so that a freshet can now do no damage, and the goldfish swim contentedly among the pond lilies, blissfully unconscious that a torrent may be roaring in the culvert below. Hung on the branches, low and spreading, of the oak tree are orchids of many rare sorts and baskets of ferns and dainty vines. Begonias of many varieties, chief among which I noticed my favorite Ernani, and Rubra and Jessie. A true Arabian coffee plant, bananas and some delicate palms, add to the tropical appearance. It is not my intention in this article to describe varieties, but rather to give my readers just a general idea of how an out-of-door fernery may be planned. The plentiful use of hardy ferns such as Woodwardia radicans and the Polypodiums along the bank, and of Kenilworth and Ficus along with Lycopodiums, add to the luxuriant effect of the lush green in under the heavy shade of the overhanging branches laden with foliage and pendant vines, drooping ferns—and over all the charm of seclusion, for as you will see by the photograph of the street view of Belvoir, no one would suspect this beautiful retreat to be back of the palms and the house. The birds have found it, though. Mr. Hadley told me that when he first came to Belvoir to reside, he found upon listing the birds that only seven seemed to live in the neighborhood, while now, after five years of tree growth have developed, there are over thirty lovely songsters making their home in and about the [illegible] and among the palms.

Tree Ferns and Their Ways.

At Santa Barbara, at Montecito, at Ventura and [illegible] Angeles I have repeatedly seen splendid tree ferns [illegible] quite out in the open without shelter or unusual [illegible] of any sort. To be sure, the best specimen of [illegible] fern I have ever seen is on the estate of Mr. G. [illegible] pie at Montecito. I regret that I cannot give my [illegible] photograph of this fern to admire, but the peculi[illegible] tion of the tree proved too much for my skill [illegible] photographer, so I shall have to try to draw a [illegible] ture instead. In the first place the whole fern[illegible] Gillespie's comes upon you as a surprise. You [illegible] der over the estate all day and never find it, [illegible] as it is by a copse of bamboo and shrubs, and [illegible] hanging oaks; and yet it is only a step from the [illegible] driveway, and a sight one would go far to see. [illegible] a group of several handsome tree ferns in under[illegible] tecting branches of a great oak tree. The best [illegible] is a native of Australia, Alsophila australis, a [illegible] found, I believe, in South America. This speci[illegible] its trunk about eight feet, in height possibly more [illegible] fronds, any one of them will completely obscure [illegible] man from sight who may step in under them. [illegible] twelve feet long I found the single fronds to be [illegible] surpassing beauty.

It is of course a well-known fact that in tropical [illegible] tries the tree fern attains great height, sometimes [illegible] sixty feet, but most of us are familiar with dwarf [illegible] house specimens, and trees like these at Montecito [illegible] revelation.

The trunk of a tree fern is formed by the axis of [illegible] being constantly elevated, thus producing as it were [illegible] nodes between the fronds. The trunk forms a [illegible] woody tissue not unlike that of the palms. As the [illegible] fronds decay, they fall off, leaving sometimes [illegible] markings. Now the roots do not originate at the [illegible] the trunk as in an actual tree, but at the base of the [illegible] from which the fronds spring, hence the trunk of a [illegible] tree fern must be kept moist, and, in this country, where [illegible] our sun is so hot, sheltered so that the roots will not [illegible] out and become injured on their way to seek nourishment [illegible] from the earth. Where a tree fern is housed, if it [illegible] comes too tall for its location, it can be cut off at the [illegible] bottom, and reset, by selecting a time when the plants [illegible] are dormant. There are something like forty species of [illegible] tree ferns grown in the hothouses of civilized lands.

Their treatment should be not unlike that of any [illegible] fern growth in this climate. Leaf mold and loam in [illegible] plenty, good drainage, water, some sunshine, and protection [illegible] from wind or draught.

LOOKED LIKE FLAGSTAFF.

"The great giant never made a greater sensation," [illegible] the old circus man, "than he invariably did when [illegible] on the deck of a steamboat.

"When we shipped from one town to another [illegible] commonly moved by the road, but sometimes when [illegible] were going to stop at two towns along a river [illegible] distance between the two was great, and the [illegible] could make a profitable dicker with the steamboat [illegible] ple, why, then we'd make the skip by boat. [illegible] ing in this way the giant did tremendously advertise [illegible] show.

"You see, we couldn't have him crawl aboard [illegible] by the gangway, between decks, and curl him [illegible] there somewhere, below; we had to carry him where [illegible] could be seen by all.

"He would step up from the wharf to the stage [illegible] upper deck and stay right there through the trip, [illegible] view from the river's banks on either side, a mile [illegible] as the steamboat's chimneys. And seen walking [illegible] ing there as the boat came along, or sitting there [illegible] in a great armchair that we never failed to carry [illegible] for him, he made a sight that everybody along [illegible] came out to see and looked at with wonder.

"And when we had come to where we were [illegible] where they could see the great giant close at hand [illegible] the people there looked at him in awe.

"All of which, as you can easily see, made [illegible] great for the show—in fact, we never hit a town [illegible] harder than when we hit it so."—[New York Sun.

SOMETHING WE ARE BEHIND IN.

Had there been the same progress in roadmaking [illegible] has taken place in other lines, the United States would [illegible] deed occupy an enviable position among the nations. [illegible] But such, unfortunately, is not the case. An antiquated [illegible] system has been adhered to in farming communities [illegible] erally that has prevented all progress in this direction. [illegible] Education has been fostered, great libraries have been [illegible] founded, the country has reached a pitch of prosperity [illegible] hitherto unknown, but the subject of internal communication [illegible] cation has been grossly neglected. There ought to be [illegible] once a great improvement in this respect if the country [illegible] to take its proper place in the onward march of civilization.—[Norristown Herald.

DEBT AND HAPPINESS.

Blodgett: I should think it would be awful to be in debt [illegible] the way you are.

Tiding: Oh, I don't know! I've known lots of people [illegible] who owed money and I've known some who had money [illegible] owed to them; and the latter always seemed to be the [illegible] most unhappy.—[Boston Transcript.

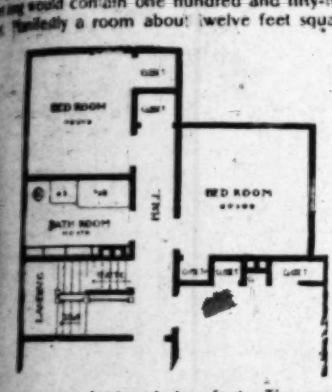
LIVING HABITS DEVELOP CHARACTERISTIC AMERICAN PLANS.

By a Special Contributor.

In plan of arrangement American dwellings have a character distinctly their own. As different as they are from one another, there are, nevertheless, certain distinguishing qualities which run through them all. A house may be large or small, but there is always the stamp of the American plan. One might think there would be a close resemblance between a typical American house of eight or ten rooms and a middle-class English house of about the same size. This, however, is not the case. Those whose business it is to exhibit house plans says he has never been able to impress an American client with the English, German or French house plans. The reason is not far enough. Conditions of house service and methods of living are so essentially different, that the house which is suited to one nation is not suited to another. The idea of convenience, as we understand and express it, has little counterpart in the English or French plan. In the better class houses of the detached type the idea of symmetry is always present. With American plans, however, symmetry is rarely dominant. About as far as we ever go in this direction in house planning is to put rooms of about the same size on each side of a center hall, and the fact that the plan is symmetrical to this extent is merely incidental. This is certainly never done for symmetry's sake alone, as is so frequently the case in French house planning.

The question of house service has had a great deal to do with making the typical American house compact. There has been a disposition to save space, if for no other reason than to save cost. The reception hall plan came out of this thought and did not exist to an appreciable extent until the question of house service became a matter of very serious consideration. It very often happens that the reception hall has no more area than the long side hall of years ago. A hall seven feet wide and twenty-two feet long would contain one hundred and fifty-two square feet. Manifestly a room about twelve feet square is better than one seven by twenty-two feet. The space twelve feet square forms a room that is available for living, and the space seven feet wide is not very good as a hall, and most assuredly is not a room.



The reception hall plan is even more convenient and pleasing on the second than the first floor. A part of the space may be utilized as a room with a view to the street, while the space connecting with the stair hall will be large enough for all surrounding rooms to open into. This is infinitely better than the old plan with a hall from front to the front and a ropewalk kind of a hall connecting the front and rear parts of the house. Within reasonable limits every foot that can be saved in upstairs floor space is very desirable, and wherever such saving can be made there is the corresponding saving of many steps and much cleaning.

The plan given herewith has a little reception hall and living-room on the first floor, with the stairway so placed that the stair-landing is almost exactly in the center of the second floor. For that reason the means of communication from one room to another, and from the hall to the various rooms, is brought about in the most economical manner possible.

As to the bedrooms little need be said. By examining the plan it will be seen that each has good light and excellent ventilation—the two most essential conditions for a sleeping-room. The spacing of doors and windows is such that convenient places are found for furniture, with the proper light for dressers, and bed space free from drafts. The rooms are large enough for comfortable living, but not so large that unnecessary time is required for their care, or large expenditures of money for heating.

There are ten bathrooms in a moderate-sized town in the country at this time, where there was one fifteen or twenty years ago. The location of a bathroom on the second floor of a house has entirely changed the use of bedrooms in the American home. We remember, most of us who are not too young, that "going upstairs" was once a distinctive operation. It was associated distinctly with retirement at night and the housework next morning. Now, however, conditions have changed. The second floor is a living part of the house, and we finish and decorate the rooms as seriously and thoughtfully as any other part of the structure. With the bathroom on the second floor, the various operations of living and sleeping are very much simplified. The washbowl pitcher, the carrying upstairs of water, and the carrying downstairs of slops have been eliminated.

The bathroom is the second floor workshop, just as the kitchen is the workshop for the first floor. There are houses in which delicate articles, laces, handkerchiefs, etc., which it is not wise to trust to the laundress, are not washed here. Instead of brushing clothing in the bedrooms before placing them in the closets, these garments are now taken to the bathroom for cleansing. This keeps all of the dust of such work in one room, by one window, and thus reduces the necessary sweeping and dusting in the bedrooms. But it makes necessary a bathroom which is readily cleaned, one in which there are no unnecessary projections, in which the bath fixtures are the most easily cared for and the most sanitary. It makes imperative a room large enough so that one can move about easily, and one which is exceptionally well lighted and ventilated. No room in the house so needs sunlight every day.

The porcelain tub, or the one of metal with the porcelain lining and the white enameled paint on the outside, the one which stands on legs and clear from the floor, is a great advance over the copper-lined, wood-incased tub of years ago. The marble-topped or porcelain washstand, with nickel trimmings and connections, which stands free on metal legs or brackets, is a great improvement over the old inclosed catch-all, the dire disease-breeder of earlier times. But the greatest improvement of all is the modern closet. It is simplicity itself compared with the one which came so prominently into vogue about the time of the Philadelphia Exposition of '76. The use of those old inclosed fixtures was difficult of eradication from the minds of the people. One architect in the Mississippi Valley worked for many years with his clients before he could get them to consent to install a porcelain tub. The slight additional cost and the change of habit combined to make them difficult of introduction.

In the old bathrooms the incasing of the tub and other fixtures suggested the wainscoting of the walls with wood. Nothing could be worse. A bathroom should contain as little woodwork as possible. On the walls, painted plaster is infinitely better than wood, and if the paint be enameled it is still more easily cleaned. Marble is superior to plaster where one cares to ignore the question of cost, and tile being non-absorbent is better than either.

There is a chance for an honest difference of opinion in the matter of the bathroom floor. From the standpoint of cleanliness the ideal floor for a bathroom is tiles, but there is more every-day work in caring for it than for a well-prepared and well-finished hardwood floor. The non-absorbent tile has a sanitary value which cannot be realized in any other material. It is not as pleasant to walk over as wood, especially in bare feet, but then there are bath rugs.

In the bathroom should be the clothes-chute from which soiled linen may be dropped to the basement. For sanitary reasons this chute should be ventilated out through the roof by some sort of simple, substantial duct. In the bathroom there may be closets for bath linen, neatly finished with well-finished woodwork. There may be especially-arranged receptacles for toilet articles and bottles. This woodwork should have a dainty finish, but should be absolutely simple and plain, so that it may be cleaned by going over it with a cloth, with no digging into corners. Even where one has the marble or tile wainscoting, the plaster above should be painted, preferably with the enamel paint, and dainty figures may be stenciled thereon at a cost so slight that anyone can afford it. Where a wood floor is used, the same sort of finish that will do for a kitchen floor is suitable. The best is none too good, and the best is not expensive.

The position and arrangement of closets is an important factor in the planning of a modern house in which the saving of labor is a primary consideration. The linen closet which contains the bedroom linen should, of course, open into the hall, and in no way should be related to a particular room. With the walls properly painted, and the shelves neatly filled and shellacked, all surfaces are easily cared for. This reduces the amount of cleaning to a minimum. Closets in other parts of the house usually follow the traditional idea of having a shelf, a number of hooks, and an occasional clumsy drawer or two. It is within the ordinary bedroom closet that great changes might be made which will add to the comfort, ease and simplicity of living. Bedroom closets fitted with light, shallow drawers, and with pigeonholes for hats, shoes and other articles, are a great improvement over the old arrangement. Where clothing is placed in deep drawers there must be more or less of a mixture, while it requires a great deal of labor to keep well-arranged shelving which is not subdivided. Shallow drawers are altogether better than deep ones, and infinitely better than a lot of close hooks. Certain of these drawers should be long enough to receive a skirt without folding, while others may be shorter to contain smaller articles. With closets of this kind, where the drawers open directly into the room, and with pigeonholes which may readily be approached, very little shelving and very few hooks are needed.

A closet should be arranged as thoughtfully and carefully as a modern desk. It thus becomes a great economizer of time and labor. Such closets have been built with drawers two and one-half to four or five inches deep, and so arranged as to suit the various members of the household. Oftentimes they have been constructed with two sets of drawers of the same general size and arrangement, the upper above the height of an ordinary closet door. Thus twice during the year, with the radical change of the seasons, certain garments or articles of utility may be shifted from one set to the other. At such times only is the step-ladder or chair brought into use.

THE LENTEN BRIDE.

THE CHANGES THAT HAVE MARKED HER GOWNS IN A DECADE.

By a Special Contributor.

THE Lenten bride is to some extent a contradiction inasmuch as she comes into the fullness of her joy in the very heart of the penitential season. If she is a Church of England girl she knows that this is allowed, though hardly approved, and when, as in old England, she hears, with roses mantling her cheeks, the second and third calling of her bans, she may find herself a little mixed as to love and religion, for love in the happy stage is very like religion, and anyone knows that religion is love. Now, if the Lenten bride wishes to give some concession to custom, as regards the hour of her wedding she might have an English wedding before 12 o'clock in the day, and then it will savor more of a sacrament than of the pomps and vanities of this wicked world. Her wedding gown of soft clinging white is just as appropriate for a morning wedding as for any other, but instead of bride's roses she will carry a tiny white prayer book, or those exquisite fragrant lilies of the valley, or if near to Easter she may foreshadow the season of awakening by carrying a sheath-like bunch of glorious ascension lilies.

It is strange how greatly the effect of a bride's gown has changed in the last decade. It used to be regarded as the thing to have stiff brocades and satins, and what stately beings brides were in those days! Now a much more sensible and graceful custom prevails, for the soft, fluffy, airy materials that are used are the natural concomitants of girlish beauty, and one can have the privilege of being stately many times, but this golden glamor of youth comes but once.

There is an infinite variety of these soft materials to choose from at present, many new names with only slight variations of texture. Among these crepe de chine holds its own as a favorite, though various combinations of lace and chiffon are new and fetching.

A certain exquisite simplicity and air of high-bred costly grace characterize the wedding gown shown in the picture, and which was worn quite lately by one of our sweetest Los Angeles brides. The material is a snowy crepe de chine, the skirt being full and flowing, with a graceful round sweep to the train, and is shirred to outline the pretty curve of the hips, while around the bottom of the skirt are the two tucks seen in so many of the Paris models for the spring season. The drop skirt underneath has many ruffles and frills right at the bottom, which are so necessary to hold out the length of skirt which now lies on the floor all around and which is only achieved by standing the prospective owner upon a very thick book while the skirt is being fitted and adjusted in length.

The bodice of this pretty gown has a round yoke of silk net which is shirred on chenille, and the shoulder droop is given by the lovely folded bertha which extends about the shoulders and is edged with the rarest of old rose point lace. Much has been said about the revival of the 1830 styles, for some time past, but if you wish to know how startlingly true this is, you should have seen the costume worn by Mrs. C. Q. Stanton at the Ebell Colonial tea last week. It was formerly worn by a Louisiana belle of 1830, and had the self-same folded bertha that is seen in this bridal gown of the dear girl of today. We have not arrived at the narrow pointed wasp-like waist of Mrs. Stanton's old-time gown, but if the hints from Paris are true, ere long we shall adopt that also.

A high folded girdle confines the bouffant bodice of the bridal gown, and the sleeves are of the latest cut, extending clear down over the hand and shirred tight to the arm as far up as the elbow. A full drooping puff characterizes the outer part of the upper sleeve and is confined on the inner side with several rows of shirring. The treatment of the neck is always an important point, and in this case the shirred yoke is simply continued to form the collar around which was clasped a chaplet of pearls. It is a fortunate bride who has a gift of such pearls, as even in olden times they were never cherished more than they are at present, and they set off to perfection a certain type of beauty.

A bride's veil is a chapter all by itself, and though modes may come and modes may go, it is a matter in which the bride may please herself so long as the effect is artistic. The custom of draping the veil over the face is regarded as passé at present, but I cannot relinquish the thought of it without a sigh, for it is full of sweet suggestion and has that poetic Oriental charm which must have existed in the days when one cried: "Behold! the bridegroom cometh." The veils with daintily embroidered hems are best for draping over the face, and should be put on so that the part over the face can be conveniently and becomingly laid back when the ceremony is over.

The plain veil of illusion is the one in vogue at present. It is fastened to the hair with an ornament or with those dainty blossoms of poesy which are another relic of Oriental significance attaching to bridal customs. The veil is then looped in cascades which begin at the shoulder and are carried out clear to the end of the train. If properly arranged, this gives a ravishing effect of cloudy billows and fluffs, and is attained by cutting dart-shaped pieces out of the sides of the veil, and sewing the edges together to form the cascades.

It would be well for the Lenten bride to bear in mind that the customs of her gentle grandmother who sewed sweet thoughts into her own lavender-scented wedding gown, are upon her grandchild of today, and she must have her wedding gown and all her bridal finery sewed by hand. Except for lining seams, there must be no desecrating machine work to destroy individuality. If a member of the family has not the patience for such fine work, and if the modiste rebels, then, dear bride-to-be, you to a nunnery where you will find soft-still preserve the gentle art of needlework, and enjoy the making of a bride's gown.

After the wedding gown, the going-away point of consideration, and we have caught a charming little outfit for this especial shirt-waist suit of fine gun-metal taffeta, but chic and striking to a degree. The skirt are fashioned with box plaits about an inch width. The sleeve has the same box plait fullness of the upper arm, and these are let puff lower down. This same principle is fullness to the skirt in which the plaits are in round-apron effect, and this same round yoke upon the bodice. A modish lines developed in two toned gray ming of black velvet and wings, is wo and has with it one of those fascinating black with light gray dots. A short tai pletes this suit, and, to give it a dressy of lace which looks like the Battenberg p wrap is a thing to dream of. It is made of cloudy gray chiffon in very close throughout. The lace almost seems to piece and lies over the chiffon, which fri ruffle, where the lace ends. The sleeves There is a full undersleeve of accordion and the lace fits down smoothly over the continuous piece from the neck. One sleeve is slit, and the chiffon peeps through panne velvet in a deep coral tint, a little outlining the little turn-over collar and the short wrap. Four brilliant rhinestone this Parisian creation, which changes the waist toilet into a wonderfully dressy garb, convenient combination. One might think coloring rather too sober a costume for a the cut and the bright shimmer of the from any hint of somberness in this case, cially fine setting for a blooming young girl.

Rub all through a sieve, thicken slightly with a tablespoonful of flour, add salt and pepper to taste and simmer again for at least five minutes.

Be sure that the butcher gives with the meat a piece of suet. Cut fine a little of it and melt in a frying pan. In this when smoking-hot quickly sear and brown the meat, turning several times; if the piece is a flank steak first score it slightly, but in close parallel strokes on both sides. As soon as browned transfer it to a covered pan or kettle. Dredge into the frying pan sufficient flour to absorb the fat which remains and stir it until dark brown, then pour in sufficient boiling water to make a scant pint of gravy. Add to it any seasoning desired or on hand—a bay leaf or clove, a slice or two of onion, a pinch of curry powder, besides salt and pepper; a little stewed tomato is admirable if any is to be found in the pantry, but this is not included in the expense account. Pour this gravy round the meat, cover closely and place in a moderate oven. Allow twenty minutes for heating through and an hour for each inch in thickness. As it is not a tender cut, it is to be made so by the long, slow cooking. Before serving, strain the gravy.

Less than a quart of potatoes will make a good dishful when mashed. Beat into them salt, pepper and a quarter of a cupful of hot milk.

The usual price of dried lima beans is 8 cents a pound, and at that rate 6 cents' worth will be ample. Pick over, wash and put them to soak the night before. They will need about three hours' slow, steady cooking. During the last hour let the liquid on them boil down to a scant cupful. This is to be thickened with a teaspoonful of flour mixed with cold water and a seasoning of salt, pepper and one teaspoonful of grated or scraped onion added with, just before taking from the fire, one teaspoonful of butter.

From the vegetable counter select a tiny but firm white head of cabbage. Remove the outer leaves, shred the remainder very fine with a sharp knife or a slaw cutter and soak for an hour in cold water. For the dressing take one cupful of weak vinegar or, if very acid, use part water. Mix one scant tablespoonful of corn starch with one-half of a teaspoonful of salt, one-quarter of a teaspoonful of white pepper or a dash of cayenne, one-half of a teaspoonful of sugar and one-quarter of a teaspoonful of dry mustard. Rub to a paste with a little cold water, turn into the boiling vinegar and stir until thick, then cook slowly for five minutes. Add a scant tablespoonful of butter, stir until dissolved and pour the dressing over one well-beaten egg. This may be poured at once over the cabbage (which has been drained and dried in a cloth) and closely covered until the slaw is cold; or, if the cabbage is preferred very crisp, the dressing may be chilled and served separately.

Prunes which are small in size, but of good flavor may be had at from 5 to 8 cents a pound, and one-half of that weight will be sufficient. Wash and soak them for a full twenty-four hours, then place in a double boiler, cover with fresh cold water and cook slowly until tender. When cool enough to handle, cut each open and remove the stone. Soak one-quarter of a package of gelatine in one-quarter of a cupful of cold water. Boil down the juice until reduced to one cupful and a quarter. Add one-half of a cupful of sugar. Bring again to the boiling point, add the soaked gelatine and take from the fire. Arrange the stoned prunes in a wetted mold or a glass dish. To the syrup add a few drops of vanilla and pour over them. Set aside to chill.

Rio or Santos coffees, while cheap, are rank and strong. An excellent quantity of Maracaibo, which can be had for about 14 cents, is, in the opinion of many, quite as rich and as good flavored as a Java and Mocha mixture. For boiled coffee take the usual proportions—one tablespoonful of the ground coffee for each cupful. Mix to a paste with a little cold water, add the crushed shell from the egg used in the dressing. Turn this into the scalded pot, add the required amount of freshly boiling water, stop up the spout and boil quickly for three minutes. Throw in a tablespoonful of cold water, draw to the side of the fire and let stand for a few minutes to clear itself.

When one has a well-filled purse to be devoted to the needs of the table it is not difficult to plan varied and excellent menus. It is a different matter when the wherewithal to purchase is severely restricted, and we must make up the difference by skillful planning and judicious buying. In many localities the subjoined bill of cost may be inaccurate, especially in the far West. In such case, however, the lessened cost of meat would about balance the higher prices put upon other commodities. As purchased in Pennsylvania, New York and other Eastern States the marketing list should be something like this:

THE LOST "H'S" BEWILDERED HIM.

A member of the bar of Great Britain, with a pronounced cockney accent, once appeared before Judge Lawrence of the Criminal Court. In the course of his remarks the advocate, who was appearing for the prosecution in the case involving the theft of a halter, constantly alluded to the article of equine equipment as an 'altar. Justice Lawrence, unable to stand it further, called before him the clerk of assize and asked, in perfectly serious tones, albeit with a certain twinkle of his eye:

"Is this the crown court?"

"Why, yes, my lord," answered the bewildered officer.

"Thank you; I am right, after all. I thought, perhaps, I had found my way into an ecclesiastical tribunal."—[Success.

Farming in California—The Land and Its Products.

FIELD NOTES.

J. W. Jeffrey, Agricultural Editor.

Concluding Institutes.

THE following notice of the spring sessions of the Farmers' Institutes has been received from Prof. A. J. Cook, conductor for Southern California: Thursday and Friday, March 31 and April 1, Anaheim; Friday and Saturday, April 1-2, Monrovia; Monday and Tuesday, April 4-5, Elsinore; Wednesday and Thursday, April 6-7, Hemet; Friday and Saturday, April 8-9, Bloomington; Monday and Tuesday, April 11-12, Cucamonga. Mrs. Minnie E. Sherman, of Fresno, Prof. C. F. Baker and Mr. Fred Maskew will aid at these meetings. It is also hoped to have a good speaker on poultry culture. These will be the concluding institutes of the year.

Acacia Melissima.

As Arbor Day approaches, whatever that day may mean to real tree planters, public interest is liable to be stimulated in all that relates to shade and ornamental plants. One of the city's improvement associations is contemplating the use of the black wattle whose botanic name appears at the head of this note. Mr. Braunton, our best local authority upon ornamental plants, recommends it strongly, and observation confirms the value of this thrifty, umbrageous tree for shade purposes. Individually the black wattle furnishes some of the most beautiful, protective specimens in the entire list, and I am pleased to learn that it will bear trimming well. No street tree should be planted that will not thrive under the terrible onslaught of the linesman's machete. The park at Santa Ana probably has the finest specimens of this acacia in this part of the State.

Sour Sap.

ABOUT four years ago the deciduous trees of this section, especially the peach, were almost universally affected with sour sap. This is a disease sometimes and at others a mere condition. Where the roots stand in water sour sap may become a chronic malady, affecting the whole economy of the tree and finally taking its life. Severe cutting back to reduce evaporation till the roots may form feeding fibers, draining the land where necessary and aerating the roots by cultivation, may restore the trees. Frost in March or early April may produce a form of sour sap by checking the flow about the beginning of leaf formation. This affection is scarcely a disease, for a little time usually restores plant action, when the trees will completely recover without treatment. Cutting back is advisable, where the souring process has damaged the younger wood. Look to the health of your deciduous trees if we have late frosts. There is little danger of sour sap this season from standing water.

Treating Walnut Trees.

BACTERIOSIS of the walnut is a local disease of the fruit, leaves and tender growth of the English walnut. Do not let your neighbor make you believe it is not a disease or tell you it is caused by the sting of an insect. Because the malady is mysterious, and difficult of treatment does not justify one in denying its existence. Consumption, diphtheria and typhoid do not yield readily to remedies, and one of them may be incurable. Yet the causes are pretty well understood. Their existence is not disputed. Bacteriosis of the walnut is of a class the chief remedy for which is copper sulphate. Farmers have immersed their seed wheat in bluestone water for generations, not to make the seed better, but to destroy the germs in the wheat that may get into the circulation of the growing plant and produce smut. The germ of the walnut blight is just as well demonstrated, and why should not the same remedy apply?

One reason treatment of the walnut trees has not been more successful is the prevalence of waste about the trees—dry leaves upon the ground and infected branches in the trees. The dead limbs should be cut and destroyed and the leaves turned under so deeply that the infection could not get into the air. Then apply the Bordeaux mixture. Ten pounds of lime, ten pounds of bluestone and forty gallons of water have been used safely upon dormant trees—more than double the copper sulphate usually used in the mixture for foliage application.

Practical Application of Water.

FROM data in hand covering the work of eleven citrus fruit growers, I find they used an average of about ten inches of irrigating water one season, with an average of eighteen inches of winter rainfall. This was applied in an average of five irrigations from May to October, running from three to seven applications during the season. Applying the rule to this season of two inches rainfall it would require 90 inches of ditch water to supply the deficiency—an appalling margin against the season of 1904, yet not so in reality. For it is a fact that excessive irrigation is the rule from abundant stream supplies, and often the quantity of water used is far more than is needed. The season from which our data was drawn is probably one of these. The greatest evidence we have of super-abundant irrigation is the fact that the lands and streams lying below an irrigation district are becoming filled with this surplus more abundantly each year. The water supplies at the Rincon Pass, below Riverside, have turned the bottom lands into tule swamps. The lands bordering the San Gabriel River east of El Monte are now furnishing increased supplies, both in the stream bed and from adjacent wells. Whatever amount of water secures plenty of wood growth, healthy foliage and good crops of fruit is sufficient, and the question of how much this is in inches is very hard to determine. Another element enters into these investigations. With a rainfall of eighteen inches we have no means of determining how much of this is of summer use to the soil. We know a large proportion of it is lost, and that the main utility of a heavy rainfall lies in the replenishment of the sources of summer irrigation. A good precipitation saturates the soil and feeds the capillaries of the soil longer than one of lighter degree, but it does not require 18 inches to fill the soil to its utmost capacity.

Apple Valley.

THE TIMES has done something toward the popularization of apple culture in the south by continually publishing items of interest to those contemplating a trial of the business. But the editor has no knowledge of vast tracts of land in Southern California all suitable to apple culture. One correspondent asks if there is a tract of 80,000 acres in San Bernardino county that may sometime be planted to this fruit. I do not know of that much strictly good apple soil and situation in the whole south. There is a certain quantity of fine apple land near Hesperia, and enough interest has developed to cause a large tract there to be named "Apple Valley." The tract lies ten or fifteen miles from Victor, and toward the Bear Valley. It is not in the province of this department to boom land, and I can only speak generally for an investigation of the mountainous lands of this part of the State for apple-growing.

Without attempting to designate localities most suitable to apple-growing, there are a few points so well known as to become imperative in the selection of soils and situations for this business. Near the coast the apple succeeds well from the northern to the southern limits of the State as far as location goes. A certain characteristic of good apple land near the ocean is not good in a hot, inland valley. This may be modified by the statement that a few early varieties may do fairly well in low, inland sections. But winter varieties never. At a sufficient elevation, say not lower than 2000 feet, this fruit is most productive and profitable. Where winter temperature is mildest the apple will bear second and even third crops, making fruit of no value and yet detrimental to the regular crop. Second-crop grapes are of much value, but the exposure, elevation or temperature of the apple must be such that there may be no tendency to winter growth or adventitious blooming.

Reassurance Unnecessary.

A REPRESENTATIVE of the Imperial Canal properties has just returned from Washington with the assurance that the government will never disturb the developments in the Colorado delta country at Imperial, and that laws will be enacted if necessary to confirm the right to use the water there for irrigation purposes. Had it not been for the Desert Land Act, a United States law, no great scheme of irrigation would have been possible of achievement here, barring the new national movement, which was not thought of when the Imperial plan was broached. How would it be possible for the government to undo the results of its own authorization, even if the administration was so inclined? The primary object of the National Irrigation Act is the opening of farms in the arid territory. The incentive to capital to the undertaking of the vast Imperial enterprise was the farm unit, and no progress whatever was made in this vast achievement till the farmer became interested and contracted in large numbers to possess himself of the land for actual farming operations. With the same end in view, it does not matter so much whether the government, or a number of mutual irrigation districts redeem the land from arid conditions, for the dual enterprise of small farmers and the California Development Company depends together upon the working out of agricultural achievements of the district. Morally, as well as legally, the government is obliged to foster and if necessary to protect the work of its people in this great undertaking. In addition to this the National government has enough to tax its entire resources for the next 100 years in reclaiming other territories where the utmost enterprise of the people acting in their private capacity could never prevail. One does not have to be the less a friend of national irrigation to sustain the work of thousands of farmers acting where they can upon their own responsibility.

War and Potatoes.

THE farmers have the idea that potatoes will be in demand along the Yalu for many months to come, and some of them have been skirmishing frantically for seed potatoes for several days. One of them tried the never-failing peat lands last week driving all day in search of seed, but finding none. The late rains have set the potato growers to planning for a large crop, expecting more rain. Some of them are prepared for a successful season without further precipitation, the late rains having put the ground into fine plowing condition, and if they can succeed in running down a few tons of kartoffeln for seed, Cossack and Japanese will not have to forage altogether from the fortressed gardens of Mukden or the sterile steppes of Tsi-tsi-har.

Potato planting in California of a favorable year is like a vaudeville show—a continuous performance. New potatoes make their growth in the fall from ground soaked by irrigation in July and August. The second run occurs in December and January when the thermal conditions are good and the third crop is planted in February, March, April and May. In some of the interior river sections many plant in June and July, covering practically the entire year, and while some sections are digging their main crop are making their first planting. California has a growing capacity far in excess of the demand of the Coast. Potatoes are too cheap a commodity to be profitable for long transportation, but in the face of strong Japanese demand, which has already begun, there is a prospect of high prices for the next year on the coast.

Neglect Will Kill.

SOME months ago I sent to the State University a sample of soil from about the roots of badly diseased orange trees, seeking an explanation of the cause of the dying and uprooting of the trees. A preliminary report was received last fall, and I have just received a more complete analysis. This shows that there is nothing wrong with the soil. It is well supplied with humus, and is below the average in general fertility, hence the conclusion that in most cases of orange-tree disease some active agency is at work to the destruction of the trees, and that the trees in most cases in perfect condition, even when apparently are affected by a mysterious disease. The specimen of soil in question was first examined, the trouble pronounced "gum disease," but it had manifested the excellent tendency that the Berkeley authorities could not upon to determine whether some poisonous substance was not become incorporated. I now conclude that neglect, bringing the orchard to a low range of vitality, caused the trees to become non-resistant to any disease that might get a start in the grove. When a tree dies in the same row decay at the roots and at the ground with the tops in said condition, one may conclude the soil was in some way responsible for the trouble. If the analysis shows the fault to be in allowing the soil to become so weak that recuperation and fruitage impossible.

Pruning Peach Trees.

I HAVE just received an inquiry as to the best time to prune peach trees, the grower informing me that he has such a large orchard that the trees would be in bloom before he could compass the work with the force at his command. Comparatively little pruning is necessary for the peach. Some growers "shorten-in" the shoots annually as apricots are trimmed, but this is considered a waste of time and perhaps detrimental. In pruning I refer to the removal of dead or weak branches. This should be done always. If pruning is practiced it is to get the tree full of wood capable of bearing a crop. Pruning of fruit should follow rather than precede the bearing area, for a healthy tree will push fruit to the limit of the branches as grown from the trunk. Ease of cultivation should never be sacrificed to the hot sun by the removal of the lower branches.

The inquirer, however, is pruning for a crop hence the usual practice is to be held in abeyance for a more propitious year. A short time ago I saw the trees of an almond orchard which was made profitable during a severe drought, while all the adjacent orchards were practically barren and perishing with the same quantity of water enjoyed by the profitable orchard. The man's idea is good, even necessary to the maintenance of his trees properly if the rains do not bring more rain. Those who have orchards should remember to start the main limbs of the tree from different points of the main trunk, inches, two feet and thirty inches from the ground are allowed all to start from about the same breaking down of a single main limb would not ruin of the entire tree. An umbrella and should be trained entirely upon different year.

Important Affirmation.

FOR some time a discussion has been going on in the fruit trade papers of the east regarding the right of a commission merchant to recover from a shipper deficiencies resulting from the sale of consignments after deducting advances made to the grower. The statement of a case made by Mr. L. J. Lippman, a prominent New York court, through a jury that the commission man may recover losses from which advancements have been made:

"My firm of J. & G. Lippman was called make an advance on a carload of Florida owner, Mr. William H. Brown of Tkusville, Fla. the advance upon the fruit as requested, and rival here in New York found that it was in caying condition, and necessitated exceedingly handling. We accordingly repacked the fruit, quantity of it at private sale and the bulk the earliest possible moment, netting a loss action of between three and four hundred which fact we promptly advised Mr. Brown, the account sales and a request for his check ference. Mr. Brown paid no attention communication, whereupon we consulted Messrs. Wilder & Anderson, No. 45 Cedar advised us that under the circumstances to recover the difference between the goods and our advances and expenses. and the case was recently tried in the City Honorable John Henry McCarthy and a very careful and able statement of the law Justice, the jury rendered a verdict in full amount asked for."

While no one questions the justice of The Country's Apple Holdings.

THE monthly report of the Executive Committee of the International Apple Shippers' Association makes mighty interesting reading and throws a good deal of light on the apple situation as it stands now, and also allows of a certain amount of prognostication as to the future. Even with a substantial discount for a certain amount of inevitable inaccuracy in the report, there is still space for a good deal of careful and fairly accurate figuring.

Taking the keystone of the situation, New York State, we find that the city of New York alone on February 1, 1904, had 90,000 barrels in cold storage as against 150,000 last year. Albany and Troy this year have 40,000 barrels in cold storage. Taking a few of the important shipping points in Western New York, we find, according to the Executive Committee's report, that Carlton has 10,000 barrels in cold and 12,000 in common storage; Wolcott, 5000 barrels in common; Buffalo, 16,000 barrels in cold and 4000 barrels in common; Barkers, 8000 barrels in common; Appleton, 16,000 barrels in common; Lockport, 76,000 barrels in cold and 30,000 barrels in common; Albion, 75,000 barrels in cold and 80,000 barrels in common; LeRoy, 75,000 barrels in cold and 25,000 barrels in common; Spencerport, 8000 barrels in cold; Rochester, 40,000 barrels in cold, and Brighton 80,000 barrels in cold storage. Total. By these figures compiled in New York tateS, we find that there were 629,500 barrels in cold storage February 1, 1904, and 365,050 barrels in common storage as against 849,500 barrels in cold storage February 1, 1903, and 38,350 barrels in common storage. Totaling again, this gives New York State's total holdings in cold and common storage on February 1, 1904, at 984,550 barrels as against a total of 1,115,000 barrels at the same time last year. In other words, New York State has 130,450 barrels less to move at this time of the year than she had last year. But for the severity of the weather and consequent tying up of operations in the State, this amount of apples would have been, of course, greatly diminished, but even as things stand the quality of the stock now held is fully twice and possibly three times as good as the stock in storage this same time last year.

There is no doubt but what with a let-up in the weather and the consequent opportunities for liberal shipments that the markets will easily absorb all that can be offered them, although the report of the Executive Committee does not show the shortage through the West that has been generally thought to exist.—[Fruitman's Guide.

THE DAIRY.

California Dairy Output.

THE State Dairy Bureau has just completed the compilation of statistics of the butter and cheese output of California during the last year. The total butter production for 1902-03 was 34,677,311 pounds. That of the preceding season was 31,528,762. The dairy output amounted in value to $20,436,152 for the last season; the butter produced was worth $8,669,077. The cheese sold for $856,996; condensed milk represented the value of $621,233, and during the year Californians consumed $6,682,738 worth of milk. Calves raised and sold for veal realized $1,724,-[illegible] and the pork that was raised on by-products had a value of $1,881,264.

The coast counties, excepting Los Angeles, showing 40 per cent. increase, and San Diego, which made a gain of 31 per cent., have just about held their own. Humboldt county, the largest butter-producer in the State, shows a slight decline. The gain is therefore confined almost entirely to the counties in Southern California, the San Joaquin and a portion of the Sacramento Valley. During the season two more counties crossed the 1,000,000-pund mark in butter production. They are Stanislaus and Tulare, making nine in the State with an annual output of over 1,000,000 pounds. In the case of both these counties, the increase over the previous year amounts to almost 60 per cent. Kings and Merced counties gained each approximately 30 per cent., and Fresno 25. Five counties in the San Joaquin Valley—Fresno, Kings, Merced, Stanislaus and Tulare—made a total gain over the previous year of over 1,500,000 pounds, or approximately 30 per cent.

In the Sacramento Valley there are only two counties in which dairy development is as yet conspicuous. These are Sacramento and Yolo. The former gained a little over 10 per cent. and the latter 15. The production of butter in the State shows a steady increase from 23,691,028 pounds in 1898 to 34,676,311 pounds in 1903.—[California Fruit Grower.

Shipments of California Celery.

THE California Vegetable Union writes us from Los Angeles under date of February 1 as follows:

CALIFORNIA VEGETABLE UNION.

The Union also encloses the following interesting comparison of celery shipments:

Last season (1902-03:) Nov. 1 to Feb. 1, 928 cars shipped; Feb. 1 to close of season, 558 cars shipped. Total for season, 1540 cars shipped. Number of acres planted to celery, 1823.

This season (1903-04:) Nov. 1 to Feb. 1, 988 cars shipped; Feb. 1 to close of season, 400 cars (estimated.) Number of acres planted to celery, 2550. Decrease in shipments present season, 152 cars. Orders in hand (prompt shipment,) 65 cars. There are 335 cars yet unsold.

The best portion of the season is ahead of us, as during February and March the markets are always the best.

Note.—1823 acres planted to celery last season (1902-03;) 2550 acres planted to celery this season (1903-04;) 727 acres in excess of last year, but shipments will be 152 cars less brought about by continued drought and cold weather. The remaining 335 cars won't last long.

Early Winningstadt Cabbage. No shipments in car lots to date, a condition unheard of in past seasons.

Snowball Cauliflower. Sixty-five per cent. of crop moved. Fifteen cars going forward weekly, when we should have at least thirty cars weekly to supply all markets satisfactorily. Crop will clean up in four weeks.—[Fruitman's Guide.

POULTRY.

Preparing Capons for Market.

WHERE there is a market near at hand, capons are usually found quite profitable. The following directions from the American Agriculturist should be preserved for reference, if you think of growing capons for market.

"Capons are in most demand after the holiday season and until well along into the late spring and early summer. A capon does not reach its prime until nearly matured, which requires from nine to twelve months. A young, immature capon is no better than a cockerel and will not bring any more money. Medium-sized capons, weighing from six to eight pounds, are most in demand. The large ones, ten pounds of above, are too big for families to use to advantage, and must go to hotels or restaurants at a lower price.

"They are fed for market much the same as other poultry. Capons are naturally quiet and will not run their flesh off, even if given full liberty. It is best, however, to confine them in a small pen by themselves and feed abundantly on fattening and growing feeds. Equal parts of ground oats or barley and corn meal mixed, if possible, with skim milk, makes a splendid ration. Give them all of this they will eat, three times a day.

"In dressing for market keep them for at least twenty-four hours before killing without food or drink, so that the crop and intestines may be empty. If there is any food in the crop it soon turns black and gives the bird a bad appearance. Kill by bleeding through the mouth, and pick dry. Feathers should be left for about two inches around the head, and on the neck, half way down the legs, on the wings and tail. After cooling they are ready to pack in clean boxes holding 12, 24 or 36, if shipped to commission dealers."

THE FARM.

Rich Harvests from Abandoned Farms.

A FEW weeks ago we discussed in these columns some of the ideal and picturesque returns to be obtained from investment in abandoned farm property. Yet there are many people, of course, to whom an asset not immediately transferable to coin appears of a very slight value. Such a one has just been definitely questioning concerning the value of such farm investment as we cordially commended. From an answer supplied us by Gov. Batchelder, it appears that not only are the uses of abandoned farms sweet—like those of adversity—but that they are commercially profitable as well. Immediate returns, we are informed, can almost always be drawn from summer boarders. Our authority seems to hold—and we fancy that the facts are with him—that no New Hampshire farmhouse can be too poorly equipped to pay as a summer hostelry.

Then there is the dairy business, the highest development of which is to be seen in the Leighton farms near Dublin, or in the magnificent Whipple creameries at New Boston, sources of supply for that unexcelled milk and butter enjoyed at the hotels here in older Boston. Cattle and poultry raising are mentioned as other "paying" occupations. Somewhat more ideal, however, though still very profitable, is such an occupation as that to be seen at Madbury, near Dover, N. H., where one of the largest rose gardens in New England has been successfully established, and from which thousands of magnificent American Beauty blooms come to the Boston market every year.

As for the marketing of timber upon a well-ordered plan, and the possibly profitable preservation of fish and game—these as means of earning money from farms are too obvious to need more than mention here.—[American Cultivator.

BEE KEEPING.

An Interesting Experiment.

AN interesting account comes from Berkeley concerning a series of experiments being conducted by Prof. C. W. Woodworth, of the Department of Agriculture of the University of California, who is carrying on an interesting economic experiment in the culture of bees and the production of honey. For this purpose he has had constructed what is in effect a bee hive made entirely of glass. Through this all the honey-making operations of the bees are being carefully watched, and in addition the materials used by the bees and the product are being carefully weighed.

The object of the test is to ascertain the minimum cost of production and at the same time to secure as good, if not a superior quality of honey. The food which is being substituted in the place of the nectar of flowers is beet sugar. This is moistened to a paste-like consistency and placed under glass cases within reach of the bees. The whole apparatus is placed upon the scales, so that daily records can be made of the amount of material consumed and of the quantity of honey produced.

The experiment is being carried on entirely within the transparent hive, the bees being allowed no communication with the outside world except for the purpose of carrying out their dead. Apparently they have no objection to the close scrutiny under which they are living, for they carry on their work just as under ordinary conditions. The important feature of the experiment is the substitution of artificially prepared food in the place of the usual plant products from which honey is made.

Manufacturing Possibilities.

SAMUEL N. GOLDY, a well-known manufacturer of San José, has written a book entitled "The Era of California's Supreme Industrial Possibilities," in which he urges that greater attention be paid to manufactures, and shows how easy it should be for this State to compete with the East in many branches of manufacturing industry. The first chapter is devoted to a comparison of Los Angeles with Bridgeport, one of Connecticut's leading manufacturing cities, with startling results in favor of this city. The great importance of this subject warrants the devotion of a considerable portion of this week's "Development" page to the following extracts from this book. It would be a good thing for the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce to circulate several hundred thousand of these extracts in circular form among Eastern manufacturers:

"A stereotyped phrase which has passed from mouth to mouth, and heralded over the United States and the manufacturing world, to the effect that California never could become a manufacturing State, would, upon the examination of census returns of the manufactured products of the several manufacturing sections of the world, seem irrational and incongruous.

"In round numbers, the average gross manufactured product of the United States, per operative, represents a value of $1900; of France, $650; of England, $485, and of Germany, but $450. These figures prove an undeniable ability on the part of the American worker, being nearly three times that of the ablest European operative.

"The universal application of automatic machinery, ingenious appliances and improved methods is without a doubt the cause of the marvelous difference in output between the United States and the countries of Europe, and these improved methods in turn are naturally due to the superior educational advantages of the United States.

"More startling, however, is the great difference in efficiency between California operators and those of Eastern and European sections. For example, the value of the average gross manufactured product of California, per worker, is $3328, and of Connecticut $1997. These figures show the Connecticut operator to be nearly $100 in efficiency above the average of the whole Union, while the California operator has to his credit in efficiency the almost incredible amount of $1428, or one and three-fourth times the average of the whole Union, and nearly seven times that of the English worker.

"It would be well, however, to particularize by comparing the foundry and machine-shop production of an old and established industry of Bridgeport, Ct., widely known as a manufacturing city, with that of Los Angeles, famous as a health resort.

"This comparison, though it may appear ridiculous in the extreme, owing to the amusingly absurd equipments of Los Angeles as compared to those of Bridgeport, will, however, suffice to show that the efficiency of California workers over those of the East must be due to climatic advantages.

"The census returns show that there were 31 establishments in Bridgeport, with an invested capital of $2,319,172, and a value of products of $2,412,796, produced by 1540 wage earners, whose total wages were $832,534. In Los Angeles there were 34 establishments, with an invested capital of $1,021,034, and a value of products of $1,545,406, produced by 552 wage earners, whose total wages were $359,920. The average investment per establishment was, respectively, $74,812 for Bridgeport, and $30,030 for Los Angeles, which shows an average of nearly two and one-half times as much invested in Bridgeport establishments.

"The investment in buildings in Bridgeport was $367,600, and in Los Angeles $51,992, an average of seven and three-fourths times as much invested in Bridgeport per establishment; while the investment in land for the Bridgeport establishments was $193,800, two and three-fourths times greater than the investment of $76,981 in land in Los Angeles.

"The net value of the products of Bridgeport per $1 invested in buildings was $4.20, while in this city the net value of production was $15 per $1 invested; this difference is due to California's climate advantages; no provision for heating, or guard against frost being required.

"By subtracting the cost for materials used from the full value of products, there remains the net value produced by the wage earners; the cost of materials used in Bridgeport was $876,527, leaving to the credit of the Bridgeport wage earners a net value of $1,536,269, or $998 per worker; the cost of materials used in this city was $770,371, leaving to the credit of the local wage earners a net value of $775,035, or $1401 per worker, a production of 40 per cent. more than the Bridgeport worker. This shows that the Bridgeport establishments, with their workers, could have produced their products in this city with a saving and efficiency of $251,118, which, when taken together with interest and taxes on the difference of cost of land and buildings, and the saving of fuel of $36,716, represents over 13 per cent. of the total capital of the Bridgeport establishments, one-half of which would pay the freight to any section of the Union.

"The cost of fuel, rent of power and heat in Bridgeport was $61,038, and in Los Angeles $24,248. In reality the cost of coal in this city should be divided by two, as the price of coal in California having about the same calorific power as that used in Connecticut, is double the Connecticut price, and even then there would remain a difference in favor of this city of 38 per cent. on account of the relative value of oil to that of coal, for the census report is based on coal for both places, whereas oil fuel is now extensiveiy used in California.

"The population of Bridgeport, according to the census of 1900, was 70,996, and the total number of wage earners 19,031. The population of this city was 102,479, with 8044 wage earners. From this it is seen that the industrial population of this city is very small, and that in order to bear the same ratio to the total population as in Bridgeport, it should be 27,290 instead of 8044.

"Eastern establishments may be established in California, but the California climate cannot be had in the East."

Olives and Olive Oil.

THE olive industry has made a decided turn for the better during the past couple of years. There is still some room for improvement in conditions, as they affect small growers, but they will come in due time.

Among recent additions to the list of olive and olive oil packing industries is the American Olive Company, whose factory is at the corner of Adams and Long Beach avenue, in the southeastern part of the city. The organization is a combination of olive growers and practical canners and packing-house men, James Irvine, owner of the big San Joaquin ranch, C. H. Frost, president of the Los Angeles Pressed Brick Company and owner of the Frost building, C. H. Sessions of the Belle-Vernon Farms Company, Rev. Henry A. Lewis, growers of olives, W. E. Hughes, who is president of the company, and Vernon Campbell, J. A. Campbell and K. B. Campbell are the packers, Mr. Campbell being the discoverer and perfector of a process by which ripe olives can be packed in sealed tins without the use of chemical preservatives. These goods the company is now putting on the market in quart and gallon tins, under a handsome label. The factory is complete and up to date. The style of the building is Mission, 150x180 feet, the outside walls being plastered with cement over expanded metal lath. It is located on the line of the Long Beach branch of the Pacific Electric Railway, where it crosses East Adams street. The company contemplates large additions to the building next season.

The company is now shipping its product East in carload lots. The stockholders of the company own among them about 400 acres of full bearing olive orchards. During the height of the season the company employs about seventy women and thirty men.

Cotton in New Mexico.

THE following is from the Carlsbad (N. M.) Argus:

"Notwithstanding the conditions of last year, when, owing to factors that were little less than phenomenal, and which can never occur again, the chief result of which was shortage of water at critical times, there will be nearly two thousand acres of cotton planted in the vicinity of Carlsbad this spring.

"At this time the acreage is fixed by S. A. Ramsey, president of the Ramsey Ginning Company, at 1700, and it is more than likely that the acreage will reach 2000 by the time the ground is ready for the seed.

"Last year cotton was an experiment here, and while to a certain extent the crop was not up to expectations, enough was learned to convince the pioneers that the staple could be successfully raised by irrigation, and that if the seed were gotten in early enough to make the season as long as possible, a most satisfactory yield could be expected on the rich, sandy soils of the county. On one tract last year the Ramsey-Brady Company raised a bale and a half to the acre, and while it is not claimed that this average can be maintained, it is thought that a bale straight through will be safe calculation, as soon as the farmers have learned the rudiments in the cultivation of the plant. Mr. Ramsey, who is an old planter, was the adviser for the whole community, arranging for the seed, running the gin and generally advising the farmers, believes that the crop the coming year may be conservatively estimated at 1500 bales, and according to the reports of the mill men, the quality is equal to that of cotton grown in any part of the South, surpassing that of many localities which have for years been in successful production.

All of last year's planting, and of this year, will be of the standard varieties, though experiments are in progress looking toward the growth of long staple and Egyptian cotton. Small tracts were planted in these fancy varieties last year, but they were gotten in so late that they were caught by the frost, and while the promise was excellent, it will require this year's work to tell whether it can be depended upon. The government is assisting in the experiments, and the result will be watched with much interest, as it will mean much to the valley if the long fiber can be grown successfully, as it commands much more than the standard in all the markets of the world, and the supply is never equal to the demand."

Natural Mineral Water.

THERE are a number of mineral springs in Southern California, but only a few of them have so far been exploited on a commercial scale. One of the latest waters to be placed on the market is the Elliotta, a white sulphur water. It is stated that this water has been used and highly prized by old settlers for more than half a century. The sale of this water has grown into a substantial business in Riverside, and S. C. Tompkins has now commenced making shipments of the water to Los Angeles. Following is an analysis of the water, made by Prof. Hilgard of the University of California:

	Grains per Gallon. Parts per
Sodium sulphate	10.326
Potassium sulphate (small.)
Sodium chloride	4.090
Sodium carbonate	1.128
Calcium and magnesia carbonate.	0.876
Calcium sulphate
Silica	2.921
Organic matter, chem. comb. wtr	2.745
Total	22.196

In sending this analysis Prof. Hilgard wrote:

"While this water is somewhat high in, soluble salts for the use of some persons, a majority would be benefited by the slight laxative action of the salts of the soda. For irrigation and other domestic purposes the water is unobjectionable."

Irrigation Possibilities.

FOLLOWING is an extract from a report by J. B. Lippincott, supervising engineer for the irrigation work of the United States Geological Survey in California, for the Colorado River:

"During the winter season practically all the work of the geological survey for the California division in the Southwest is being concentrated along the Colorado River. It is in charge of E. T. Perkins, engineer. A topographic map in ten-foot contours of all the land between the mouth of the Grand Cañon and the Mexican line will be finished in about thirty days. This will show all reservoir sites as well as all the irrigable land, and is the base for a comprehensive and exact study of a general way of the irrigation situation along this river. The topographic division of the geological survey, in operation with the Imperial company, is to make a topographic map of the entire irrigable district from south to the Mexican line, and east to the Colorado River. This will be a very satisfactory basis upon which to form a general distribution system. Detailed investigations now going on upon which to base plans and estimates for a project to irrigate the lands both in California and Arizona on either side of the river above and below Yuma—all of this data to be submitted to the Secretary of the Interior for his consideration. The different drilling outfits are at work on the river above Yuma prospecting for bed rock upon which to found dam structures. A definite canal location is being made on the California and Arizona side, upon which to base estimates of cost. Probably one hundred men will be engaged in engineer parties, and it is to be hoped that this work will be sufficiently advanced to make a definite report upon during the coming summer.

"The Yuma Indian reservation on the California side under laws that have now been passed, may be thrown open to entry when the lands are irrigated, and allotments of five acres be made to Indians now living thereon. On the Arizona side there is a considerable area of public land that can be reclaimed and a large area of which is now either entirely arid or partially so, but in private holdings can be benefited.

"The engineering problems on this river are unique and probably among the most complex that will be encountered in the arid region. There is no reason for believing, however, that these questions cannot be successfully solved and works constructed that will give satisfactory results. Probably the greatest opportunities in the west for very extensive irrigation development are on the Colorado River. The volume of the available supply, the area of irrigable lands, the fertility of the soil and the character of the climate, all point to a great development. This district would be tributary trade to the towns of Southern California, and is believed to offer probably the greatest latent resources of the Coast district. Reservoir sites of large capacity have been found in the upper portions of the river to supplement the low stages of the river, which fortunately, in midwinter. This locality, however, is what may be termed a twelve-month country, that can be continuously farmed throughout the year."

More Water on the Desert.

AN important addition has been made to the resources of the Indio country, on the Colorado desert, by the development of water in a well one hundred feet from the mountains, a considerable distance beyond the nearest existing well. The well belongs to E. Holley of 1166 West Thirty-ninth street, Los Angeles. It is 124 feet deep and has 84 feet of water. A gasoline engine will be put in operation in May. Mr. Holley owns 320 acres there. He will plant forty acres to melons—mostly Rose of Peru and Muscats, which do well in that section. Mr. Holley says that 180 acres of additional land will be planted to melons this season. The melons are marketed in New York by the Indio Melon Association.

Big Power Plant.

THE Visalia News has the following in regard to the Mount Whitney power plant, now approaching completion:

"The Mount Whitney Power Company will install a second power plant in operation by the first of May. The machinery has been purchased and will soon arrive in a few days, when installation work will be begun. The new plant, we are informed, will develop 2000 horse-power, which will make a big addition to the electrical power distributed in this county. The present shortage of power is attributed to the cold weather which has frozen up the smaller streams in the mountains.

PRACTICAL HYGIENE.

By a Staff Writer.

[The Times does not undertake to answer inquiries on hygienic matters that are merely of personal interest, or to give advice on medical cases. General inquiries on hygienic subjects of public interest will receive attention in these columns. No inquiries are answered by mail. It should be remembered that matter for the Sunday issue of The Times is in the hands of the printer a week before the day of publication. Correspondents should send their full names and addresses, which will not be published, or used by others, without the consent of the writers. Addresses of correspondents are not preserved, and consequently cannot be furnished to inquirers.]

Natural Life.

In all ages there have been men who, wearying of the artificial life that mankind has drifted into, have sought various ways to return to primitive simplicity—to get back to nature. Diogenes was an example of this, although they do say that he mistook dirtiness for simplicity. During the past half century many enthusiastic hygienists have sought to adopt a simple and natural method of living, with more or less success—generally, it must be confessed, rather less than more. The trouble with most of these people is that they go to extremes, and thus destroy their power for good. It is an excellent idea to expose the skin to the air and sun, but it is doubtful whether a man who walks through the crowded streets of a city with bare legs is so likely to make converts as he is to excite sarcastic comments. Most people can find opportunity to take, occasionally, an air and sun bath. In Germany, where this movement toward a natural life has made more progress than in any other country, they make much of the sun bath, for which there are conveniences at all the leading health resorts. Benjamin Franklin by the way, was an advocate of this practice, having the habit of sitting for an hour every morning in his office entirely nude. An air bath of this kind is indeed better and more natural than a water bath, just as air is a more refined and more necessary element than water. In Southern Austria there has for many years been a hygienic institution where the patients spend the day clad in nothing but a pair of short linen breeches, wandering over the hills. Of course, they are regarded as cranks by the natives, but they greatly improve their health, all the same.

The Times recently published a letter from London telling of a German named Salomonson, who is coming to America on the invitation of Benedict Lust of New York, who has offered him a post in his publishing house. Mr. Salomonson devotes his life to propagating the gospel of the "natural man." He is 51 years of age, but is said to appear not over 40. Since September 1, 1901, he says he has not a drop of any kind of liquid has touched his lips, and that he does not even rinse his mouth with water. Water, he says, or any other form of liquid, is a terrible burden to the stomach and has no value at all."

Mr. Salomonson is a good example of going to extremes. All animals drink water. Are all animals leading an unnatural life? It is true that if a man lives principally on watery fruits and vegetables he can get along very well with little or no water, outside of that which he consumes in his food, where it has been filtered by nature, but Mr. Salomonson should happen to be crossing the Mojave Desert behind a burro in the month of July or August, the editor is willing to bet at least thirty cents that he would be mighty glad to take a good swig out of a canteen before he got to the end of his journey. Water, we say, is full of bacteria. Yes, and so is the air, but we have to breathe, all the same.

Mr. Salomonson also declares that salt is the "beginning of all evil, it is ruinous to the body, damaging to the mind and destructive to the intellect." Another extreme and exaggerated statement. The editor is opposed to the use of salt, and has frequently so stated in these columns, but why go to such extremes as this?

Mr. Salomonson eats everything raw that can be eaten and steams the rest. Here is his appetizing menu for the day: For breakfast, raw turnip cut into thin slices, a little watercress and some filberts and apples. At noon he takes leeks and potatoes and Brussels sprouts cooked. His supper is the same as his breakfast. He lives on the earth, to get "its warmth, purity and magnetism," and he says you can never get a man or woman sick in bed again after they have slept on the earth. There is doubtless some truth in this. We get, as The Times has previously observed, far too little in contact with mother earth. In fact, many of us never have our feet in contact with the earth, except when we happen to take a dip in the ocean. Hence it is a good idea to go barefoot as much as possible around the house. Mr. Salomonson says that many hundreds of men and women are adopting this mode of life in Germany and Switzerland, and he believes that before the end of the century much of the world will turn again to the natural life. If we live a natural life, he sees no reason why we should not attain to the age of 200 or 250 years, as did the people mentioned in the Old Testament.

One of the leading advocates of this natural life is Joseph Just, who has written several books on the subject, one of which, "Return to Nature," has been translated by Benedict Lust of New York, above referred to. A review of this interesting book will appear in this department as soon as the editor can find time to go through it carefully.

Physical culture recently published an illustration showing a well-built man sitting absolutely naked on a fence in a snowfield. It is his practice to take an air bath every day, no matter what the weather, and he thus has become absolutely immune from coughs, colds and pneumonia.

There is in Los Angeles there is a disciple of the "natural life" who carries the idea to what most people would consider an extreme. Many have noticed a striking figure on the streets, who goes around in short knee breeches with bare legs, and bareheaded. He calls himself the "naked man," or "the nature man," and lives on the summit of Lookout Mountain, the highest elevation in the city, where he sleeps on the bare ground under the stars, getting under a tent when it rains. He has a lithe, panther-like figure. The editor recently had an interview with him. He has a fine, intelligent face, and is a man of education, having gone partly through Stanford, where he intends to finish his course some day. His name is Ernest Willing Darling, an American, 32 years of age. He has been in the habit of going barefoot for four years. He subsists largely on fruit, but occasionally eats a little meat. He follows the Fletcher idea of chewing everything thoroughly and rejecting the refuse. At one time he subsisted for a considerable period on peaches, while he was working in an orchard. When it was suggested that such a diet contains too small a percentage of nitrogenous matter, he advanced the interesting theory that when a person learns to breathe deeply and properly, the body becomes a transformer and is able to extract nitrogen from the atmosphere. This is certainly an important suggestion in relation to dietetics, and if well founded may result in changing our theories as to the relative amount of nitrogenous and carbonaceous matter that is necessary in food. It also tends to show the great importance of proper breathing.

Mr. Darling gives a lecture—a sort of "sermon on the mount"—every Sunday afternoon. He accepts any small contributions to help him finish his college course. The circulars which he distributes are written in the phonetic style that is affected by so many of these hygienic reformers. It isn't prettily, and is very little saving in space. Here is a sample in the shape of a communication sent by Mr. Darling to the editor of the Care of the Body Department:

"The Nature Man'z Gide for Evrias ing Life. (Ritten only for thoz hoo wil take time 2 liv wel.)

"1st Kommandment: Get away from so much temptashun & wearing xsitment til u r rested & thoroly klenzd from living in the dusty, smoky, krouded sity.

"Konsumshun or eny uther lung trubl wil b a long time bothering the doktor hooz pashents liv in the dusety filthy ov eny sity.

"When u hav found a sun-favord spot, bild u a gd tent hous up in the kuntry suberbz. Begin at wuns 2 trane & tuffen that preshus body. Take yur buket ov water & a towel out behind the treez on the sunny side, lay off yur klothz & hav a water shower & sun bath together. Graduaiy brown yourself all ovr. U'l soon be tuff enuff 2 sleep outside yur tent in ordinary wethr. If u r gradual & do yur simple best u wil forget how 2 kawf.

"Abuv all uthr duties, keep in pure out-door air & take long, deep breths (1000 or more evry da.)

"Air iz God'z first and most substanshal food for all growing organizmz. When yur stumak iz at perfekt rest, then yur lungs wil larjly absorb from the air enuf nitrogen 2 make up for the lak in the stumak. Therefore by intelijent fasting & lite dieting u kan trane yur lungz 2 absord a wunderful amount ov food direktly from the air."

All this sort of thing is very well in its way. Undoubtedly mankind nowadays lives altogether too artificial a life. We burden ourselves with an unnecessary multiplicity of clothes, we shut ourselves up in stuffy rooms, we gorge curselves with unnecessary food, and in this way we make ourselves sick and miserable and shorten our lives, and have to slave from morning to night to earn money enough to pay for things that are not only absolutely superfluous, but actually injurious. It is a good thing that some people are beginning to preach a return to nature. So much for that side of the case. On the other hand, let us not fall into the error of supposing that the body is everything. That is the other extreme from the Christian Science doctrine that mind is everything. Both extremes are wrong. Both are bad. Our physical culture people are in danger of becoming body worshippers and neglecting the mind, as some of our college students do when they get enthusiastic over football and rowing. Let us remember that the body is merely a tenement in which dwells the intellect—the soul, or the mind, call it what you will. A sound mind in a sound body was the ideal of the ancient Greeks. It should be ours also.

Moreover, let us not forget that man is something more than a mere animal. It is not enough that he should be a perfect animal, physically hardened to endure heat and cold, and able to live on the simplest food. He is here on earth to accomplish something. To the editor of this department, it seems better that a man should eat the flesh of swine, and drink beer, and smoke tobacco, while doing something for the benefit of his fellow creatures, than that he should live on ideal food—angel food, if you will—and merely vegetate.

Why Not a Sanatorium?

REFERENCE has been made several times in this department to the strangeness of the fact that there is in Southern California not one thoroughly first-class, large, up-to-date sanatorium, where all the various natural methods of restoring health are practiced. It does seem strange that in this section, with its incomparable climate, which attracts health-seekers from all over the country, and indeed from all over the world, where a person may live in the open air twelve months in the year, nobody has yet undertaken to fill this "long-felt want," although such institutions are numerous east of the mountains, where the climatic conditions are not for a moment to

TOOTH TALK

PROPHYLACTIC DENTISTRY SAVES TEETH.

Tooth saving is the mission of prophylactic dentistry—and that is the kind of dentistry I practice. By prophylactic methods tooth decay is not only arrested but all abnormal conditions of the mouth are corrected, further decay prevented, and a healthy state restored to the teeth. Prophylactic dentistry enables me to accomplish perfect dental work, and I know that my treatment will give entire satisfaction in every case I undertake.

ABOUT FILLINGS

By prophylactic methods I prepare the cavity for the filling, selecting only the kind of material that will best resist the predisposing character of the mouth's secretions. By my exclusive method I insert the filling in such a manner that perfect adhesion is assured, and the filling is then as solid and durable as the tooth itself.

be compared with ours. There are a few excellent small sanatoriums, but nothing on a really extensive scale.

An institution of this kind should stand in spacious grounds—not less than ten acres, and if possible twenty or more—so as to lessen the chance of impurities in the atmosphere from any cause. It should be, preferably, in a dry, equable climate, near the foothills, at an elevation of at least a thousand feet above the sea. One of the most important requisites in such an institution is an ample supply of pure, soft water, for drinking purposes. The water should be carefully analyzed before a beginning is made on such an institution, for, as all intelligent hygienists now admit, water and air are of far more importance than food.

At such an institution there should be opportunities for the patient to enjoy any kind of diet that may be recommended—vegetarian, or fruitarian, or otherwise—or to fast for any proper length of time, amid pleasant surroundings, where he will not be tempted by the smell of food, and will be encouraged by experienced and cheerful hygienic teachers. There should also be facilities for sweat baths of all kinds, including the electric light bath, for scientific massage and osteopathy, for sun baths, and other hygienic treatments that aid nature in restoring normal conditions to those who have disobeyed her laws. There should be an ample supply of fresh fruit and vegetables of all kinds. Also, there should be good trails and roads around the place, so that the patients might be encouraged to take rambles, according to their strength. Last, but not least, there should be attached to such an institution men of intelligent, sympathetic temperament, who are skilled in the art of mental healing. Encouraging suggestion, used in conjunction with such natural treatments as those mentioned, would undoubtedly result in some astonishing cures, where patients had been entirely given up as hopeless by the medical fraternity.

Such an enterprise would cost money, but not such a very large amount—nothing like the amount that is invested in some of the big hotels in Southern California. If any readers of this department would like to interest themselves in such a project, the editor will be pleased to hear from them, and try to get them together for a practical move.

Below is published a communication on this subject from Miss Jeanette Smith, a teacher of hygiene residing in Los Angeles:

"Intelligent people are today demanding radical changes in medical methods and institutions. They want more sense and science with less sectarianism and dogma. Many believe that the time has come when the germ or principle of truth in all schools should be united.

"Today the sick are parceled out to different narrow sects, each ignorant of the others' scope and methods. A sufferer must wander from one school to another, and it is largely a matter of chance whether he gets calomel or some 'ism.'

"There should be some men broad and scientific enough to unite the advantages of all schools, to decide which particular method or methods is adapted to an individual case, and to see that these are intelligently applied.

"The fundamental principles involved in curing disease are as simple and clear as mathematics. It is only because the schools are lost in a labyrinth of error that their systems are complicated and conflicting.

"Educated people today are demanding sanatoria where they can learn how to live, how to get more life and energy, and how to start the regenerative process upon both mental and physical planes. They have learned that doctoring disease does not give life. They have seen that with intelligent direction of the mental and physical forces, there is practically no limit to the curability of disease.

"We need a sanatorium where the mind will receive more practical attention than is afforded by any present system, and will give a sound rational method of treatment on other planes. There is needed, especially, intelligent direction in fasting, hygienic dieting, sun-bathing, mechanical treatment, rational therapeutics, scientific vital breathing, and other matters of vital importance to perfect health. Under a system of this kind, it has been proved that practically everyone can develop sound health, and eradicate not only so-called incurable, but also inherited diseases.

"There is absolutely no necessity for at least nine-tenths of our present disease and suffering. It is simply due to a lack of organization of the more advanced methods, and therefore ignorance among the people. The newspapers and magazines are doing much all over the country in the educational work, but the sick know not which way to turn to get more than fragmentary treatment. One institution founded on clear-cut, sound lines, and actually carrying these ideas into effect, adapting them to individual cases, and giving inspiration as well as help, would produce such results as would solve the question of health for the entire country."

Dr. F. W. Rayburn of the Los Angeles Institute of Suggestive Therapeutics, also sends a brief communication on this subject, as follows:

"To anyone who has considered the psychological aspect of the question at all, it is very clear that environment has much to do with the cure of disease, whatever the method of treatment pursued. I have found in my practice that in some cases of nervous troubles and kindred ills, where the patients were particularly susceptible to adverse influences, the benefit derived from treatment was counteracted in a measure by home environment. Many cases which are not cured by treatment under such conditions would yield readily and quickly were the environment correct in all essentials. Since coming to Los Angeles, this Mecca of ailing ones, each day has brought me to realize more the great need there is for a sanatorium conducted on new, and much broader lines than anything we have had hitherto. Most of those who come here seeking health are obliged to go into hotels and boarding-houses, where none of the conditions are suited to their needs. Such persons would certainly welcome an opportunity to enter an institution where diet, baths, hygiene, exercise, fresh air, pure water, and proper amusement and entertainment were carefully considered, and suited to each individual requirement. The very atmosphere of such a place would be full of harmony, strength and healing. Let there be osteopathic, electric, X-ray, suggestive and other natural cures, each patient having the treatment he desired and the staff deemed best. A large percentage of so-called incurable cases would yield to treatment under such environment, while those suffering from the liquor, drug or other undesirable habits, would find permanent and speedy relief.

"I firmly believe that, properly conceived and carried out on broad enough lines, founded by reputable business men, carried on under proper management, and an efficient corps, or staff, such an institution would not only prove a blessing to the country at large, but a financial success, and a source of pride to Southern California."

Suggestion as a Means of Cure—II.

FOLLOWING is the second installment of the series of articles on the possibilities and limitations of suggestion as a means of curing disease, contributed to The Times by Dr. Alexander McIvor Tyndall, whose course of weekly lectures, now being delivered in this section, is attracting wide attention among thinking people. In this article Dr. Tyndall discusses the much-debated question of "absent treatment:"

"There are many persons who are willing to accept as possible the therapeutic value of thought when applied directly to a patient. But when it comes to healing at a distance—'absent treatment,' as it is called—they become incredulous. However, it is not so very many years ago that the theory that thought has power and force was received with ridicule, as well as incredulity. During my first visit to this country, some fifteen years ago, a New York paper published an interview with me in which it said: 'Among the eccentric theories voiced by this most eccentric man, is the conviction that thought is a force, having power, substance and weight. That it can be photographed, analyzed and employed to construct or to destroy.' A person who could indulge in such 'eccentric theories' naturally was deserving of ridicule, and it was unstintingly given. However, I have been far more fortunate than most pioneers in a new line of thought, and in the comparatively short time that has intervened between that date and the present, I have lived to see this theory very generally accepted by the thinking world. The end of the nineteenth century opened the way to marvelous discoveries in the realm of nature's finer forces through the immense stride made in the line of mechanical and electrical inventions and discoveries. We realize that what we already know is but an infinitesimal part of what may be known—and that, too, before the sun sets.

"Absent treatment—which is merely the curative power of thought at a distance—has had to endure its full share of ridicule and persecution. Mrs. Wilmans Post was arraigned before the United States courts and found guilty of infringement of the postal regulations because of giving 'absent treatment' to her many patients. Others more fortunate, have fought similar charges and won out, indicating that the opinion of judges is divided upon this point. Mrs. Eddy and her followers, are wiser in their use of this law. They call the Science 'Christian,' thus placing it in the category of religions, and naturally escaping arraignment. Such is the potency of a name!

"However, all this is beside the question, as to what are the possibilities of absent treatment and what are its limitations. If we admit its efficacy at all, we certainly have no right to set limitations upon its power. And if we admit the power of thought as a curative agent, under any of the various names given it, we are bound to believe in the efficacy of absent treatment, since thought is not circumscribed by time or space.

"There is what may be classified in a general way as 'direct' absent treatment, and 'indirect' absent treatment. For example, a healer—whether he be a mental Christian, or suggestion science healer—has a patient to whom he is giving treatment regularly. He becomes thoroughly acquainted with the character, temperament and habits of his patient. In fact, patient and healer are en rapport, so that the healer may at any time sense the thought atmosphere of his patient. A time is arranged for, and the patient sits quietly in his room or elsewhere, in a receptive condition, so that he may receive the healing thought vibrations of the one who is sending them. The result is quite as satisfactory as it would be if the healer were present, since thought knows no limitations of time or space. But, thought apparently does know limitations of conditions. It calls for receptivity on the part of the patient, and activity on the part of the operator. These conditions being fulfilled, the patient is helped by direct thought vibration, whether he be miles away or in the presence of the healer.

"Another phase of the direct telepathic or thought cure may be found in subconscious receptivity to a healer's treatment. For example, a lady who became a student in one of my classes in San Francisco, did so, for the sole purpose of learning how to treat her husband for the drink habit, and to keep him if possible from spending his money outside the home.

"Both objects she accomplished with astonishing rapidity, although the husband was unaware of her part in his reformation. Her suggestions were given mentally, and absorbed by him subconsciously, only to be expressed in due time on the physical plane. The foregoing is an excellent example of direct absent treatment, without the element of auto-suggestion, which forms, so to speak, a part in most cases of absent treatment.

"Now as to what may be termed 'indirect' absent treatment. We will assume that a healer has patients number of 100,000 persons in various parts of the world, whom he claims to be giving daily treatment. As there are only sixty minutes in an hour, and ten hours a day is as much as any one cares to give to work of any kind, he could legitimately treat only 600 patients daily, supposing that he were to give each patient one minute's time. And now we will further suppose that this healer is not acting actually and reads, or smokes or even dissipates the hours when he claims to be healing his patients. And yet, actually occurs, many of these patients are cured of their various ailments—almost miraculously. They believe, of course, that the healer is responsible for the result, and indirectly he is, inasmuch as he forms the object of concentration necessary to receptivity and auto-suggestion. The patient is fulfilling his part in the plan, by concentrating for a certain time each day, upon the healer, and his faith in his ultimate cure has an opportunity to become absorbed into the conscious as well as the subconscious mind, and he cures himself. His own healing, constructive thought force has set in motion life-giving forces that build up the diseased organs. Of course, if he were to concentrate upon an insensate stick of wood, equally as he does upon the healer, he would have the same result. The real cure is in auto-suggestion. A patient may get along very nicely without the aid of a healer, but the healer must have the cooperation of the patient. This cooperation may be conscious or only subconscious, but the suggestions or thought currents must be accepted by the patient—consciously or subconsciously—to obtain results. To be sure, there are many cases, however, through depleted vitality or through a lack of understanding of how to employ auto-suggestion—it is absolutely essential that the patient have the services of a healer. The healer directs the life forces into channels that he is the sufferer, just as naturally as the tide flows toward the land. This law of absent treatment has always been recognized, but not always intelligently used. It has long been customary for the members of a congregation to unite in prayer (healing, constructive thought force) for the recovery of its sick members, and much evidence has been adduced to indicate that such prayer has been efficacious.

Care of the Body.

"Indeed, until we know much more of thought and the law governing it, than we now understand, we have no right to set limitations upon what it may accomplish, nor dare to say without personal experimentation, what it may do in the way of therapeutics. Nor can I see any way of regulating so that the conscientious healer may be protected and the dishonest one apprehended. They both claim to cure. The one does so by direct effort, and the other by allowing himself to become the point of concentration conductive to effective auto-suggestion. Something of the wonderful power in auto-suggestion will form the subject of my next article."

Dietetic Errors.

Mrs. SARAH J. MILLSOP writes as follows from San Diego:

"There is no doubt that the generality of people eat altogether too much, and especially of flesh meat. I have seen this in the South, where the rule is to eat flesh meat three times a day. I have wondered that people should want or crave meat in this climate. Dr. Kellogg of the Battle Creek Sanatorium has not eaten flesh meat in over thirty-seven years, and he is supposed to do more work, both mental and physical, than any other two men. A prolonged fast, such as Dr. Dewey recommends, would not be needed if people were temperate in their eating. You are certainly doing a good work in trying to educate your readers in right living, and if you can prevent even a few persons from following after fashionable quacks and filling their stomachs with patent medicines, you will not have labored in vain."

A Problem Novel.

"CURSED BEFORE BIRTH" is the title of a novel by Dr. J. H. Tilden of Denver, the editor of "A Stuffed Club," a spicy little monthly, in which Dr. Tilden deals knockdown blows to superstition and fraud, whether they assume the garb of medicine or of religion. The editor of this department regards this little magazine as one of the very best hygienic publications that come to his desk, and he sees a good many.

"From a literary standpoint, little can be said conscientiously in favor of this book. The author does not pretend to be a story-teller. He is essentially an essayist—and a very clever one. The book is written with a purpose—a serious purpose. It aims to warn young women—and other women for that matter—against the baneful, demoralizing and dangerous practice of abortion, which is so sadly common in this country—far more so than in any other country of the world, civilized or uncivilized. It shows that a woman who resorts to this practice may entail untold misery upon her innocent offspring, if she does ever have a child. It shows, further, how unscrupulous physicians, some of whom make a specialty of this business, obtain a hold upon their patients, which they not infrequently use for improper purposes, so that the unfortunate victim becomes not only a physical but also a mental wreck. All this is brought out by Dr. Tilden in this book, and it should carry weight, because the author is himself a regular practicing physician, and undoubtedly knows, of his own knowledge, concerning what he writes. In his preface, referring to the false modesty that leads some people to object to the publication of such facts, even if they may be read by the general public, the author says:

"'It is immoral to write a warning to the ignorant and innocent, which will save them from an impending danger, then this book is immoral.

"'It is immoral to write facts so plain that innocent boys and girls who read them will be saved from making the mistake others have made, then this book is immoral.

"'If it is immoral to write a book which, if read, will not only better the lives of the reader, but also the lives of the coming generation, then this book is immoral.

"'If the man who warns another of a threatened danger owes him an apology for doing so, then an apology should be offered for this book.

"'If a person who saves an innocent young woman her honor owes her an apology for doing so, then an apology should be offered for this book.

"'If there are people who cry out after reading this book: "Sensation! Exaggeration!" let them go to the victims and get the truths of this book verified.

"'If the readers of this book will be as honest in their criticisms as the author has been in his convictions and object, their consciences will not be outraged.'

The book is published by the author, J. H. Tilden, M. D., Denver. Price, $1.

Nuts and Fruit.

H. C. WRITES as follows:

"I am trying the raw-food diet as a means of curing constipation, eliminating uric acid and putting on flesh. From what I read, I understand sugar to be one of the forbidden articles. I eat a considerable quantity of dates and dried figs, and would like to ask you if sugar in this form is injurious—I have not tried it long enough to be able to give my experience, but would like to know that I am starting out right.

"I think it would be a good idea and very pleasing to many of your readers if you would lay out a regular course of diet along these lines. I have tried the vegetarian diet as served in the vegetarian restaurants, but have found it does not agree with me, probably because one gets too much starch."

The sugar that is to be avoided is the oxydized, manufactured cane sugar, as turned out from sugar factories, an unnatural product, and undoubtedly productive of many digestive troubles such as heartburn, acidity, etc. The natural fruit sugar, as found in fruits, and in some vegetables, is quite a different thing, and is wholesome. It is, however, not advisable to eat large quantities of the dried fruit, as that carries the sugar in a condensed form. Fresh fruit is better.

Scarcely a week elapses that The Times, in this department, does not give suggestions in regard to diet. It is neither practicable nor desirable to constantly repeat these statements. Readers who go through this department carefully every week, and file it away for reference, with an index, will gradually secure a valuable encyclopedia of hygiene.

The ideal diet of man is undoubtedly fresh fruit and nuts, and the nearer the correspondent can bring himself to such a diet the better he will thrive. That is to say, provided he pays due attention to other hygienic rules, for a man may eat a perfect diet and be very unhealthy. As The Times has said, air and water are far more important than food, although the latter is important enough.

The correspondent also asks: "What is a good combination with nuts, to render them digestible." Nuts that are not rancid are digestible, provided they are thoroughly masticated, until they are transformed into a pulp. The reason why many people find nuts indigestible is because they usually take them at the end of a big meal, when they have already taken two or three times as much as is proper. It is well to remove the thin skin from the nut, which may be done by pouring boiling water over them, and allowing them to soak, then rubbing. In referring to nuts in this department, such nuts are included as walnuts, filberts, almonds, pecans, piñones, Brazil nuts and cocoanuts. The peanut is not a true nut, but a root, something like a sweet potato. Moreover, it is not palatable unless cooked. The chestnut contains a large percentage of starch, and is therefore not desirable. An appetizing combination to take with nuts is dried fruits, for instance such as figs, dates or prunes. In Turkey they make a palatable "cheese" of pressed figs and almonds.

Frequency of Meals.

RECENTLY there was published in this department a statement of an Eastern athlete, who declared that he needed and benefited by five meals a day. On the other hand, there was published an account of an elderly Santa Ana woman, who enjoys vigorous health on six meals a week. From a hygienic standpoint, the truth is undoubtedly on the side of the six-meal-a-week plan, rather than the 35-meal idea. The fact is that people may easily accustom themselves to eating five, or even fifteen times a day. In fact, some people have a habit of nibbling all the time, and when they can't get anything to eat, they chew gum. This is an indication of inflamed stomach and nerves, not of hunger. The "all-gone" feeling that some people complain of, when not chewing, is not a sign that food is needed, but that the stomach needs an entire rest, in the shape of a long fast, and a good internal washing with distilled water.

Great Consumers of Alcohol.

IN the course of the trial of a celebrated case in Los Angeles, in which a prominent citizen is accused of shooting his wife, the defense, in attempting to prove that their client is insane, submitted evidence that he had been in the habit of drinking a pint of whisky daily, for fifteen years. There are probably more than a thousand men in the State of California who average more than this amount of alcoholic spirits every day in the year, and yet are seldom actually drunk, although, of course, on the other hand, they are rarely completely sober. In the case of a man who never uses alcohol, one-tenth of that amount would be sufficient to produce intoxication.

This is another evidence of how wonderfully the human body can accommodate itself to unnatural conditions. Otherwise, the human race would have been wiped out of existence long ago, for most of us drink more or less poisonous beverages—if not alcoholic beverages, then tea, or coffee, or perhaps patent medicines—we breathe foul air, that would make a savage faint, and we eat food that nature never intended for human consumption, and eat two or three times as much as nature calls for. We smoke a filthy and poisonous weed, and do many other things that we ought not to do, while leaving undone so many other things that we should do. It is a well-known story how De Quincy, the celebrated author of "Confessions of an Opium Eater," had so accustomed his system to deadly laudanum that he could sit at a table and drink glass after glass of that poisonous compound with a friend who was drinking port wine. Yet, let nobody delude themselves with the belief that, because they are apparently immune to the evil effects of these errors, they may escape unscathed. You cannot fool Mother Nature. She is long suffering, but, as The Times has previously said, she invariably exacts her full pound of flesh, in the end. You might as well expect to sow clover and reap wheat, as to defy the laws of nature and escape punishment.

OUR EYES, EARS AND NOSES INDICATE TRAITS OF CHARACTER.

BY DR. W. I. SEYMOUR,
420 WEST SIXTH STREET, LOS ANGELES.

That our eyes, ears and noses indicate much in character reading will not be questioned by any who have given it a thought. The color of the eye denotes much when it comes to a test of physical endurance. The black eyed person will usually out-strip the blue eyed in this particular. Dark blue eyes are more common to those of delicate refinement, and are apt to accompany a frail physique. Nearly every shade has its significance to a close observer, but rules are hard to follow, as we often find contradicting features in the same person. but safe to say, the eye plays a strong part with all who are interested in the study of physiognomy. It is said that pilots and railroad men most often have blue eyes, but I think there is no definite ground for this general belief, unless perhaps it is because blue eyes are more apt to be far sighted than the brown or black, which may account for a better record in the examination of the sight for service. But why should we be quick to judge of ones character from such uncertain qualities as it is all too often that the entire expression of the eye is changed by some defect in sight, which may cause one to frown, squint, and even in time affect the color of the eye if allowed to go unattended.

Think of the cruelty heaped upon the cross-eyed child through no fault of its own, and I often think if the thoughtless parents of these little ones knew the humiliation heaped upon their children, which in time must leave its unpleasant mark on the sweetest disposition, they would use every effort to relieve them. This is especially deplorable since developments in recent years make it possible and even easy to correct these distorted features without the slightest pain, and with positive benefit to the general health and welfare of the patient. If you are acquainted with a cross-eyed person, particularly a child, do a charitable act; which will be appreciated through an entire life. Exert your influence to relieve the unfortunate ones who may to outward appearances be indifferent from long years of fortifying their feelings against constant derisive comment, but deep in their hearts it is the one and upper-most burden in the life of the average cross-eyed child.

Fear of an operation deters many from taking the first step, but the new methods now at the command of a competent specialist possessing the necessary epuipments for his work are such, that nine of every ten children under sixteen years of age can be entirely relieved without any manner of operation, or in any wise painful treatment.

Speaking of instruments, an oculist or optician without instruments is like a mechanic without tools. Their theories may be good, and their work satisfactory in a measure, but complete results are impossible without the scientific assistance rendered by optical instruments, which now make the study of the eye a definite science. Within the past eighteen months it has become possible to examine the entire eye, both externally and internally without the use of drugs or the slightest pain or injury to the most delicate eye.

LARGE EARS AND SMALL.

It may be discouraging to people with large ears to learn that the ears never stop growing during life. So people with big ears during early youth may expect to have regular "flappers" in old age. It is not uncommon for us to hear children say, "what big ears Grandma has got," when perhaps she used to possess ears which were literally the pink of perfection, but all too far back to be remembered by the younger generation.

It has been proven quite beyond doubt that it is really a fact that the ear never stops growing, and also that ears that are perfectly matched are almost unknown. A noted English specialist in the examination of 40,000 pairs of ears, did not find a single pair that were exact mates. While these curious facts may interest many, they are just merest incidents compared with defects in hearing, for why should we care whether our ears are large or small so long as we can hear perfectly with them. Great stress has been laid upon the ear as an indication of character, yet some of the best men and women we meet have outrageously large ears, while almost everyone can recall some bold bad person of his acquaintance who has had small well formed, and well placed ears. So let us give our attention to what science is doing for our hearing rather than the fads and fancies connected with character reading by [illegible] organs.

The ear has long been regarded as a marvel of [illegible]ism, and like the eye is considered "one of the wonderful things in the world."

But recent science in comparing these organs with present-day laboratory, has discovered that the [illegible]tiveness of these organs is dull and uncommon. The photograph plate coupled with a telescope reveals the presence of millions of stars not visible to the eye. Or a microscope reveals a world so [illegible] minute that we are unconscious of its presence, but the crude after all are the most delicate of our senses. Indeed, we may compare it with a single cell which has been enlarged by the X-ray, [illegible] and the end is yet unknown. The ear hears what is going on around us.

By means of the microphone the tread of a [illegible] plainly heard, and the beat of our heart sounds like a trip-hammer. There are varying degrees of deafness just as there are in light, and many persons who pass through life unnoticed as regards hearing, when, in reality, they hear but little of what is going on around them, and not until it becomes absolutely embarrassing will they seek the assistance of a specialist. The recent developments in [illegible] appliances for treating ears have opened a [illegible] derful possibilities to those who are hard of hearing, as the partly dormant sense can now be developed as well as positive restoration or partial hearing to those who are nearly deaf. As there are no [illegible] tures, and absolutely no dangers to people in the treatment, it is only a question of a short time when this treatment will be embraced by every person in any way conscious of defects in his hearing. Through the assistance of suggestions by the great American and the inventions of Thomas Edison, we have been able to construct and perfect an electrical treatment which is proving a wonderful success with all who take the treatment. This, together with the use of steam, vibrations and medical treatments, opens the door to recovery to those who have been discouraged in the past.

NOSTROLOGY.

The study of character by the shape of the nose certainly helps out the fortune telling palmist and physiognomist to no small extent. Some claim that the nose often blocks the way to success. Julia Marlowe tells a little story of herself. "When I was a child," she says, "I use to dream that I would some day be a great tragedienne, but my family assured me that such a thing as a tragedienne with a pug nose had never been heard of. I finally consulted our family physician, who was highly amused and assured me that my nose was all right. I knew different, and that success was more than a matter of account of it, but one can succeed in spite of such an obstacle, even a pug-nose." The day has arrived when many a pug nose can be avoided by the proper treatment of this delicate organ in childhood. It is the duty of parents to give serious thought, not only to the sight and hearing of their children, but to the formation of features as well as character which are easily molded in early life.

HOW THE KING OF ENGLAND APPEARS IN GLASSES

By way of submitting a character study in eyes I send you a picture recently taken of King Edward as he now appears in public wearing glasses. It seems to me that his appearance is remarkably improved, as close observers know that he has one eye that is inclined to be crossed, and the wearing of glasses will doubtless do much to overcome the defect, as well as improve his general appearance.

TRADES BEST FOR HUSBANDS.

EMPLOYMENTS THAT WOMEN PREFER MEN TO BE ENGAGED IN.

[Pearson's Weekly:] A French lady's paper has recently been inviting its readers to decide which among all the professions followed by men is the favorite one in the eyes of women. Which profession would they have their own husbands follow if they could choose?

The result of the inquiry was decisive; it proved beyond a shadow of a doubt that the one calling that is favorite above all others is that of the doctor. It should be remembered, however, that in France the clergy do not marry.

In Great Britain one of the first favorites among the ladies for their men folk is the profession of a banker, but in France this calling did not gain a single vote, nor did the scientist, the musician, nor the explorer.

The soldier followed the doctor, then came the sailor, the engineer, the literary man, the painter, the man farmer. At the tail end of the list came the actor and the member of Parliament.

In Great Britain matters are different, as the following little experiment shows. One hundred reply post cards were sent out not long ago, and ninety-six replies were received, which showed votes as follows:

Clergymen, nineteen; politicians, sixteen; bankers, thirteen; architects or surveyors, twelve; artists and painters, eleven; doctors, ten; actors and musicians, six; civil service men and engineers, four; stock brokers, two; editors or literary men, two; secretaries, one.

It is clear, therefore, from this very limited and admittedly narrow circle, that medical men by no means hold the same position in feminine favor here that they do in France.

Among the trades of Great Britain, that of the draper comes first in women's eyes. No doubt there is a very good reason for this, a reason that is not far removed from the easily understood belief that the draper's wife, above all others, can generally manage to be well-dressed, whether she is able to pay cash for the goods or not.

It should be mentioned that the women of today much prefer as a husband the young man who is in business for himself rather than the one who is the servant of another man.

As a class, those who follow the grocery trade are popular with women. Why this should be so it is difficult to say off-hand, inasmuch as no trade has longer hours, and no business has suffered more from keen competition.

In the good old days it was common for a youth to serve a seven years' apprenticeship to the grocery trade, but nowadays anybody can start so long as he is careful to engage the services of an assistant who knows tea from treacle.

Perhaps of all trades as a trade, that of the ironmonger seems to have the least fascination for women.

An iron monger recently said that in his younger days he had been a salesman in a boot and shoe shop, and he had almost too many opportunities of becoming an engaged young man, but that since he had thrown over leather for iron and tinware the young women had displayed a marked tendency to stand off.

Stationers and booksellers are, oddly enough, quite good friends with the ladies, who regard them as gentlemanly, and clean and respectable members of the community. A bookseller invariably has a reputation of being a well-informed and steady fellow, who will make a home-loving husband, and one who will not be easily led astray.

Coal dealers are also well thought of by members of the domestic sex, who are quite sure that the profits on coal are enormous, and well calculated to keep a good house going on the right path.

If a man is in the coal trade, he is said to be a substantial fellow, for the reason that it requires a man of capital to start in it at all.

Cabinet makers and furniture dealers are prime favorites. A woman loves looking upon new furniture, and she often admires a man for no other reason than that he passes his days in making and selling articles that go to the making of a happy home.

What woman, for instance, does not cherish the idea of one day possessing a piano of her very own? It is the furniture dealer and the house furnisher who guard the new pianos and the sewing machines.

Bakers and green grocers are looked upon [illegible] ladies who have a leaning towards shop life for [illegible] Many a smart young woman gives up her life [illegible] a wealthy family in order that she may marry [illegible] a green grocer, and share with him the little [illegible] and ironies of the life behind the counter.

Hairdressers, lampmakers, tinsmiths, and [illegible] have some difficulty in the race with men who [illegible] trades among those mentioned. Given two men [illegible] appearance, a young woman would almost [illegible] fer a baker to a hairdresser, or a green grocer [illegible] maker.

ETERNAL.

I asked the seas that grandly roll
Their emerald waves from pole to pole
If far beyond their crash and roar
There is a land of—"Evermore!"

I asked the storm winds rushing by
If they could tell me how or why
We came upon this earthly sod
And quickly go beneath the clod.

I asked the blushing rose in May,
That lives and dies within a day,
The secret of its sweet perfume,
And why it withers in its bloom.

I asked the ages moving on
To tell me of the ages gone,
And what became of those who fled
To mingle with the myriad dead.

The seas and winds and rose and age
That rush and vanish from the stage—
Unanimously then replied—
"We always lived, and never died!"

THE MAGIC CROCUS.

HOW AN OLD MISER SOLD HIS NIECE FOR HER WEIGHT IN GOLD.

By a Special Contributor.

Once upon a time, long ago, a man was walking home over the hills, singing happily. He was young and strong, and the sun was bright; it was the spring of the year, and then, too, he carried an empty sack under his arm and the coins jingled right merrily in his pocket, for his potatoes had sold well.

He spied a dainty crocus flowering by the side of the road, one that had strayed from some one's garden, and he picked it with a smiling remembrance of the days when he used to think them fairy trumpets, and that if he blew very gently through the stem and listened very hard, he would hear the sound. So now he raised it to his lips and blew, laughing, into the stem. Suddenly before him, in the side of the hill, a door opened and he looked into a narrow passageway which seemed dark and lonely.

He was puzzled, for he knew he had never seen an opening there before, but he drew near and looked in, then ventured a little farther. The door closed behind him, but a faint glow from somewhere gave him sufficient light and he walked on into a big room, apparently cut out of the solid rock of the hill. Piled high on every side were bags of money, and he decided that in some way the fairies had befriended him, for his pieces of money were few and never but once before had he owned a piece of gold. Now it was piled about him, tumbling out of some of the bags, and he opened his sack and filled it until he could lift no more.

He turned to go, but it suddenly grew dark and he saw with dismay that he could not find the door. He glanced down as he raised the sack and saw the little flower lying on the floor.

"It brought me good luck," he said, "so I will take it home."

As he picked it up and stuck it in his jacket the light became brighter, and he saw that the little flower had been the cause of his good luck. He put it to his lips once more and blew, and the door opened before him. This time he guarded the flower carefully, shouldered his heavy sack and went out, the door disappearing, leaving only the familiar side of the hill before his eyes.

But now he decided not to go back to his little house just yet; he would take his money and go to the great city beyond the mountain and enjoy himself. For two days he tramped across the mountain, no one disturbing him, for they thought he carried a load of potatoes on his back.

He reached the edge of the town and sat upon a doorstep, chatting with a man who sat there.

"Tell me," he said, "is there anything to see in the town besides the houses? I have come far and want to see the sights. Where are all those people going, and what are those bags filled with that they guard so carefully?"

A man on horseback rode by, dressed gaily, and behind him came servants carrying bags of something, carefully guarded. The townsman looked after them, chuckling.

"Old Rudolph the Miser has a niece he is anxious to get rid of. She is very beautiful, but he wants to make something out of her before she goes, so he says the man who wants her must bring her weight in gold; but no one has brought enough gold yet."

The countryman laughed. "My potatoes might weigh heavy; I will go try, I think," and both laughed again as he shouldered his bag and walked on.

But now he inquired his way to a clothes shop, for he intended to see the beautiful maiden for himself, even if he could not get her, and he knew he would not be allowed to go in his rough, soiled clothes.

Soon he was arrayed in a suit of lavender to match the little flower, which he seemed to guard more carefully than the sack, which he dropped in the corner. No one touched it, and when he turned to go he thrust his and in and felt about, apparently among his potatoes, for the pieces of gold, with which he paid for his clothes.

Gay indeed he looked as he stood in the doorway and called for a man to carry his sack for him. His suit of lavender, with yellow slashings, his cloak and cap of purple, and his black hair, well-browned face and bright, brown eyes, won him many admirers as he stalked along. For now the sack told its tale and all knew that he carried his gold to weigh against the maiden.

Already a crowd of people stood about the platform, where sat the maiden beside a huge pair of scales. Beside her stood two great man, beside whom even the stalwart countryman looked small. But the little maiden looked sad as she sat there, not seeming to enjoy what was going on.

The countryman dismissed his follower and, shouldering his own bag, he soon made his way to the center of the circle. Just as he reached there an old man climbed upon the dais, followed by men with his bags of gold. The giants picked up the maiden and stood her carefully in the scales, but not all the bags would raise her an inch from the floor, and, purple with rage, the old man departed.

Now the countryman had seen that as she was raised to the scales her skirts hung far below her feet, and the giants could scarcely raise her, though she was small; but he said nothing, and stepping forward he raised his huge sack, and thrusting in his hand he pulled out bag after bag until the scales rose gradually from the floor. With a laugh he tossed in another for full weight, and put out his hand to claim his bride.

Then he bent forward and drew aside the long skirts, showing that there were heavy weights fastened to her feet, by which the miser had hoped to add to his pile of gold.

With cries of rage the people turned upon the miser, and he fled, pursued hotly by them, for their anger was fierce at the way they had been tricked. Out of the house he ran, springing upon the first horse he saw, and, so great a coward was he that he never came back, leaving his home, his great wealth and possessions to the niece and her handsome husband.

Of course the stranger was asked where he had come from, but he told them he was a wanderer and had no home; but soon he was loved for his honest ways and his generosity among them. Some envied him and did even worse, for they even declared he had stolen his wealth, and they watched him closely.

One night in early spring he was seen to leave his home and ride swiftly away, so they followed him. He went to a little hut in an overgrown garden far over the hills, but there they lost sight of him, and all that was seen was a roughly-dressed man who carried a sack of potatoes on his back as he climbed the hill. One stole up the hill behind him and cut a hole in the sack, but only a potato fell out. Soon he was seen to put down his bag and pick a little flower which grew by the side of the road. Then he lifted the sack and disappeared.

Days later the followers came wearily home, for they had lost their way among the hills, and they glared angrily as they met the countryman and his wife riding through the town. And fastened in the cap of the man, and showing plainly against the rich crimson silk, was a little lilac crocus, such as he often wore. MARY GIBSON.

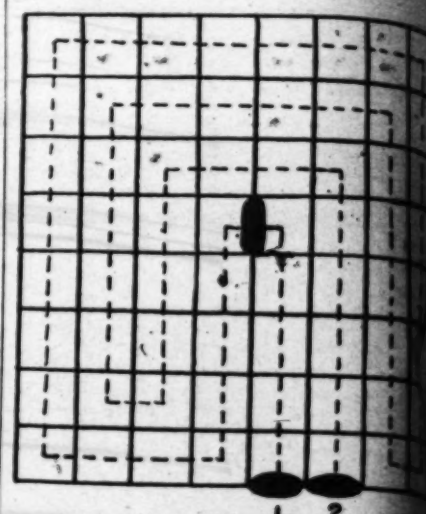
SOLUTION TO MILITARY TACTICS.

Our puzzleists and military tacticians found the problem of marching a division of soldiers into a pair of four squares and out through the adjoining gate an interesting and confusing affair.

It is safe to say that nine out of every ten performfeat in anywhere from sixteen to twenty moves. A few, however, succeeded in discovering the best which crosses all of the squares, passes under the arch and out at the other gate in fifteen which necessitated, as shown in the illustrated only fourteen turns.



The five one-dollar prizes for best answers are as follows:

Bessie Orrill, 207 Potomac Block, city; Lura M. Tustin, Cal.; Ruth Russell, 791 Merchant street, city; old B. Lucas, 251 Marengo Place, Pasadena; William ters, 1215 Sentous street, city.

SOLUTION TO AFTER DINNER TRICK.

A goodly number of correct solutions were received that pretty after-dinner trick with the goblets, but were also a great many which could not qualify the "best." Quite a number strayed from conditions leaving the glasses widely separated after effecting the arrangement or by making a move which turns two glasses around.

The solution in three moves as illustrated in the accompanying sketch is worked as follows: First pick up No. 1 and 2 and move them to the end of the line. pick up Nos. 6 and 1 and carry them in the same tion to the end of the line. Now pick up Nos. 3 and fill up the gap, which completes the operation leaves the glasses alternately full and empty and all ing.

Of course, the proceeding may be reversed, the ing move carrying Nos. 5 and 6 to the other end.

The fact that glass No. 1 was out of alignment in the ture was commented upon by some of our correspondents, but the accompanying text made it quite clear the six glasses should be lined up for the opening

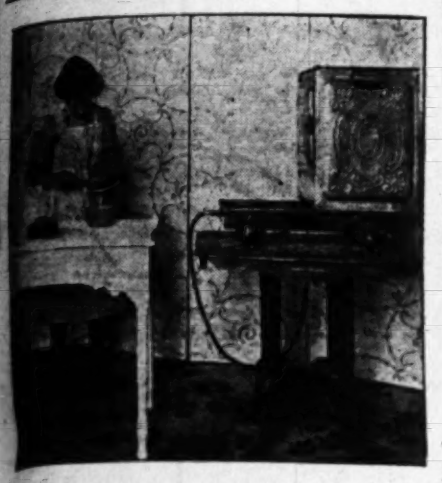
ROSALIE'S COOKING SCHOOL.

FIRST LESSONS IN CAKE MAKING—SPICE AND DELICIOUS CHOCOLATE CAKES.

From a Special Correspondent.

Rosalie, being a small girl with a very large "sweet tooth," begged that cake might come before some other things. Her first attempt at cake making resulted in what she called a "flat failure," the second was crowned with perfect success. So, you see, if your own first efforts meet with failure, you mustn't be a bit discouraged, but just "try, try again." Some days things just seem to fall, spill and go wrong of their own accord, and I know a grown-up cook who, in the first days of her housekeeping, by mistake flavored a "company" cake with machine oil instead of lemon extract; just think of it! However, a very careful following of directions usually brings success.



ICING THE CAKE.

CAKES.

In the making of all cakes the flour and baking powder should be sifted together, the butter and sugar should be stirred to a cream. If the butter is very hard it may be set where it will warm, but not melt. Add the well-beaten egg to the creamed butter and sugar, then the flour, and milk or water, by degrees; first a little flour, then a little water, until the quantity is used up; add the flavoring, and beat hard for two or three minutes. This beating makes the cake smooth and fine grained.

If fruit is used, it should be cleaned, chopped and dredged with flour, and stirred in the last thing. The flour prevents the fruit from falling to the bottom of the cake. Cakes containing molasses burn very easily.

The cake pans must be well buttered before pouring in the batter.

The heat must be steady and moderate for the baking of cake. Do not open the oven door too often, and close it gently, as jarring often makes cake fall.

A good way to tell if a cake is done is to run a clean broom-straw through the center; if it comes out perfectly smooth and without a particle of dough clinging to it, the cake may be safely removed from the oven. If it sticks to the pan, set the pan on a wet cloth, and the steam thus formed will soon loosen the cake so that it will slip out nice and whole.

After you have decided on which variety of cake you are going to make, light one burner, if you are using an oil stove, like Rosalie, turning the flame rather high, and set the oven on to get well heated while you are getting the things together which you will need, and stirring up the cake. When about to put the cake in the oven, turn the flame down low enough to give a moderate heat.

SPICE CAKE.

A piece of butter the size of a walnut, one tablespoonful of brown sugar, the beaten yolk of one egg, one tablespoonful of molasses, four tablespoonfuls of water with an after-dinner coffeespoonful of soda dissolved in it, one after-dinner coffeespoonful each of cinnamon and cloves, and one-half cupful of raisins, seeded and chopped. Bake in a small loaf.

JELLY CAKE.

One heaping teaspoonful of butter, two tablespoonfuls of white sugar, the white of one egg, three tablespoonfuls of water, four tablespoonfuls of flour, three after-dinner coffeespoonfuls of baking powder, and a few drops of lemon extract. Bake in two small pans, about six inches in diameter. They will require from eight to ten minutes for baking. When done, spread soft jelly between the layers, and sprinkle the tops and sides with powdered sugar.

CHOCOLATE ICING.

If preferred, the above cake may be iced with chocolate, the following recipe being just enough to fill between the two layers and nicely cover the cake:

Two tablespoonfuls of sugar, one tablespoonful of Baker's unsweetened chocolate shaved fine, three tablespoonfuls of sweet milk. Boil two and one-half minutes, then stir until it is thick enough to spread. This must needs be done quickly, as the icing cools fast.

EVE'S TOMB.

CENOTAPH OF OUR COMMON MOTHER IS LOCATED AT JIDDAH.

[Chicago Record-Herald.]] Half way down the Red Sea, on the Arabian coast, is the port of Jiddah, where the pilgrims for Mecca, who come by sea, land, from Aden, Arabia. It is distant about sixty-five miles from the sacred city of the Mohammedans, has a population of about 20,000, an imposing and attractive appearance from the sea, and is surrounded by funny looking Dutch windmills, which pump water from the artesian basin under the sand. But the moment you land on the shore the illusion is destroyed. The streets are narrow, dirty and full of all kinds of smells, while the population is made up of human cormorants who fatten off the pilgrims. Since the opening of the Suez Canal the town has increased considerably in importance, because it is so much easier for pilgrims to come by steamer from all parts of Turkey, India and other Mohammedan countries than to cross the desert in caravans, which was the custom for centuries. The number and the size of the caravans are decreasing every year, while the number who come by sea is growing rapidly. There is no difference in the efficacy of the journey, although one would argue that a man who has traveled a thousand miles over a burning desert ought to be entitled to greater credit than one who makes a similar distance upon a steamer.

Jiddah is of particular interest to us because it contains the tomb of our mother Eve. I never knew before where she was buried, but it is a comfort to know. It will surprise her living relatives to know that she was 140 feet tall—a very large woman to be created from a single rib. According to the tradition of the Moslems, when our first parents fell from Paradise, Adam landed on a mountain in Ceylon, and Eve was unfortunate enough to alight at Jiddah. After years of wandering they finally met at Mecca, where Adam, to show his gratitude, constructed a tabernacle on the site of the present Kaaba, or Holy Mosque, which is exactly beneath God's throne in heaven. All that is left of the original temple of Adam is the famous stone of Mecca, which was once whiter than snow, but has been turned as black as coal by the kisses of sinful pilgrims.

When Eve died Adam buried her at Jiddah. Her tomb is a cenotaph 140 feet long, built of masonry about four feet high and narrowing to a point at the top. It is whitewashed and kept quite clean. Pilgrims place flowers upon it and reverently kiss the hot masonry. Rich people often throw over the cenotaph valuable shawls and pieces of silk as offerings to the Mother of Us All, but they are stolen the first night by the vandals of Jiddah, who rob the dead and pick the pockets of the dying.

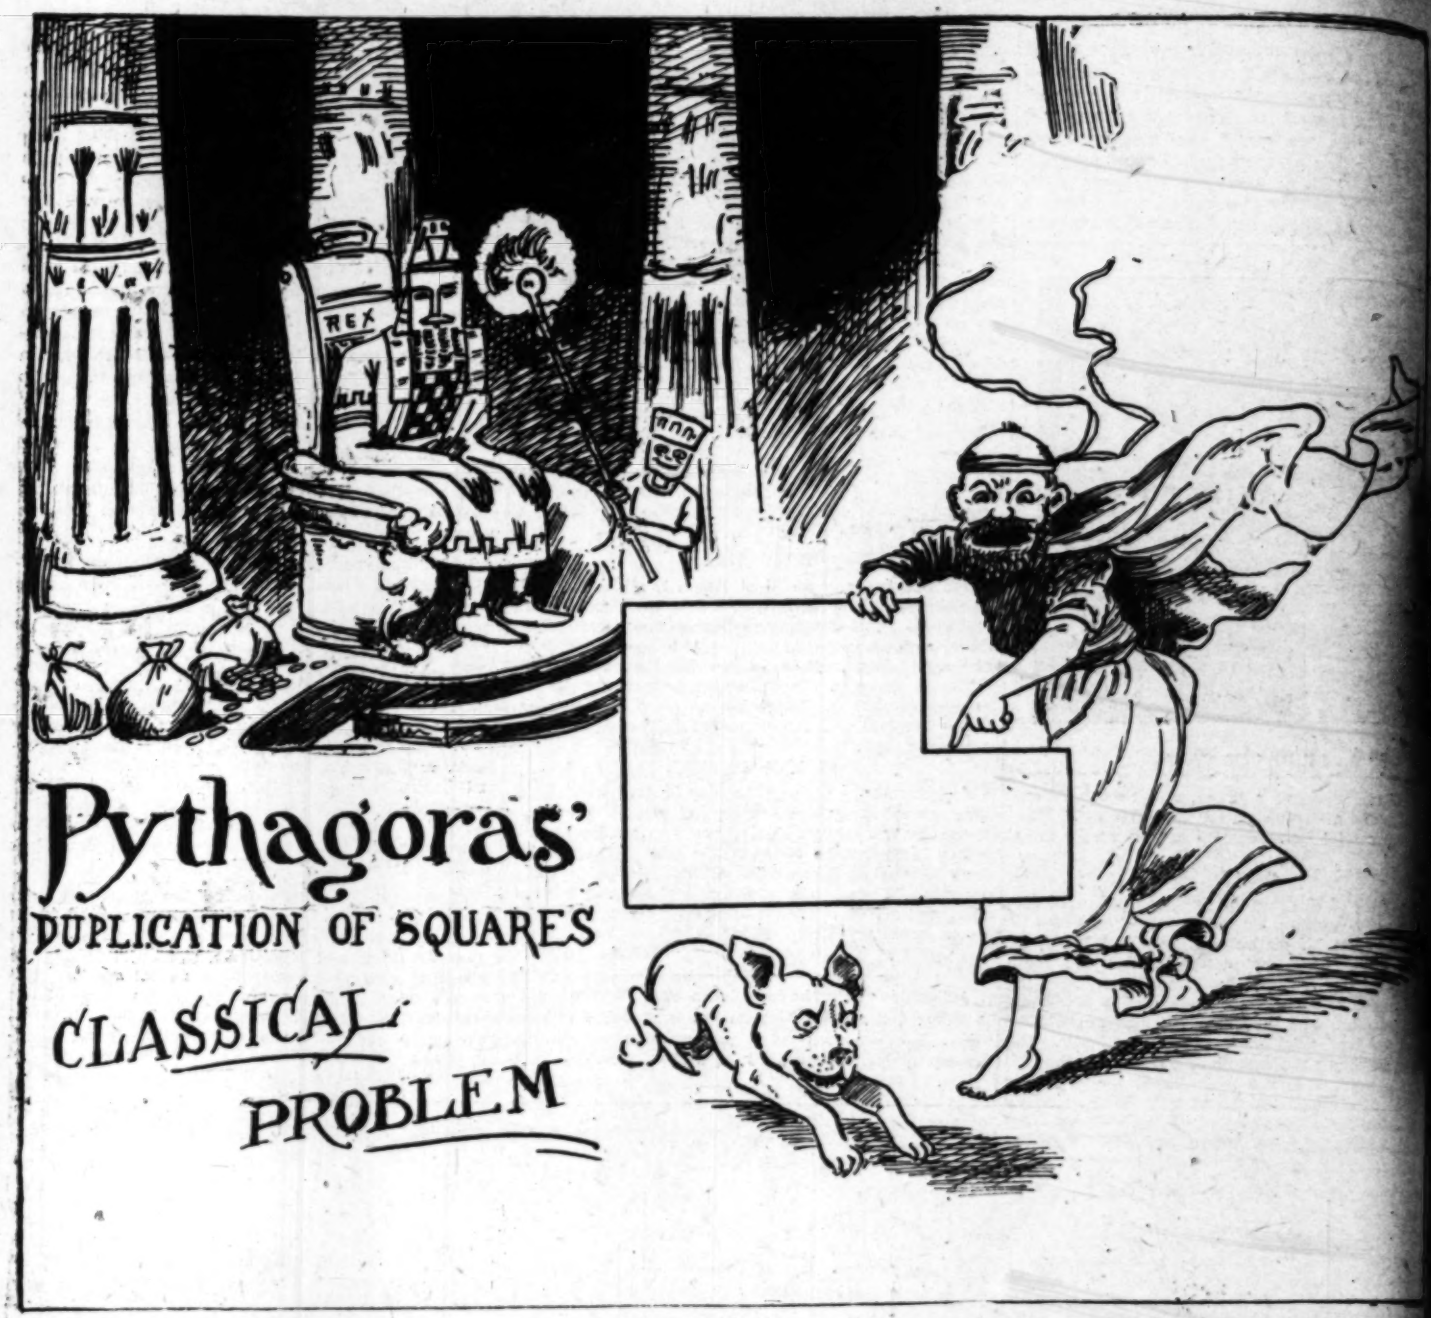
SAM LOYD'S PUZZLES.



Pythagoras' DUPLICATION OF SQUARES

CLASSICAL PROBLEM

CAN YOU REFORM THESE SQUARES?—Pythagoras lived twenty-five hundred years ago and to him undoubtedly was due the discovery of the mathematical principle contained in what is known as Euclid's famous 47th proposition—"the square of the hypotenuse of a right-angled triangle equals the sum of the squares of the base and perpendicular". Euclid lived two hundred years after Pythagoras, and as a matter of fact laid no claim to the rule which he states "is the foundation of all we know about geometry."

Pathagoras was a man of wealth and note and yet he was so elated at the discovery of a simple little rule in mathematics that he disposed of all his worldly goods and chattels and made lavish offerings to the gods to express his gratitude and impress upon the public the importance of the discovery.

To present the Pathagoras problem in puzzle form for the benefit of young solvers who prefer to study it out with paper and scissors, all they have to do is to cut out the diagram which Pathagoras holds in his hand, then cut it into pieces which will fit together and form a perfect square.

It will be seen that the diagram is shaped after the manner of two squares which he proposes to show could be changed into the form of one large square one side of which would be equal to the hypotenuse of a right angled triangle formed by the sides of the two smaller squares.

The expressions on the faces of the attendants of the temple confirms the statment that Pythagoras' discovery was not accorded the importance it deserved, as the scoffers said that "the proposition was so apparent that even an ass might see it". Even to this day there are those who accept it as a truth but do not see its importance.

Cut out the diagram and then show the fewest number of pieces into which it may be divided and rearranged into a perfect square.

Five one-dollar prizes will be awarded for best answers sent to Puzzle Editor, Los Angeles Juvenile Times.

A FUNNY COINCIDENCE.

"When he would retire at night in the same bed," said Senator McCreary in talking of the campaign, Harlan never failed to say: 'McCreary, there is one thing certain—this bed holds the next Governor of Kentucky.'" The last night before the campaign found us in a county not touched by a railroad. We had spoken and had gone to a farmhouse to spend the night. The bed in the room to which we were assigned was high and old-fashioned. We rolled in, and Harlan, as usual, said: 'Well, McCreary, one thing is certain—the next Governor of Kentucky is in this bed.'

"Suddenly the slats on Harlan's side gave way, and the present justice fell on the floor in a heap and rolled into the middle of the room, and I was left in the bed; and I said: 'Yes, I think this bed holds the next Governor of Kentucky.' I have never been able to understand how that bed knew what the voice of the people would be."—[Joe Mitchell Chapple, in National Magazine.

REFLECTIONS OF A BACHELOR.

The only way a man can fool a woman is to let her do it herself.

Women are awful soft and warm except in the spots where they are hard and cool.

It takes a lot of education to teach a woman what she already knows by instinct.

When a woman thinks of the clothes that could be bought on the money that is wasted on house rent it makes her write a letter home to her mother telling her she suspects her husband doesn't love her any more.

It makes a woman awfully ashamed to have her husband not know any better than not to pretend to his friends he is making so much money he wishes she could be made to spend more.—[New York Press.

"Yes, sir," said the waiter, "you ordered it, but afterward declined it."—[Chicago Journal.

THE BOY RANGERS.

HARRY SECURES A FINE DEER WHILE ON A HUNTING EXPEDITION.

About 4 o'clock Ned and Harry started out again to look for game, Ben, as before, remaining in charge of the camp. The two boys ranged far from camp, going nearly opposite directions. Harry pushed on across the cañon and up the ridge on the other side. Making his way carefully and silently among the pine timber he saw occasional tracks of deer and bear, and some fresh signs of what he believed to be wild cats.

As he began to descend the farther side of the ridge, where the wild barley grew luxuriantly among the pines, occasional clusters of brush varied the scenery, he heard a rustling in the brush ahead of him. Stepping quickly behind a big pine he listened intently, not even daring to go around the tree for fear of being seen.

He soon located the sound. It was to his left as he thought, and seemed to be about a hundred and fifty yards away. Again and again he heard it, and then he thought he saw a slight movement of the brush.

Becoming somewhat impatient he moved from behind the tree, stepping as he did so upon a dry stick, which broke with a loud sound. Harry gave an impatient exclamation but made another step forward, with his rifle raised.

Suddenly, with a great cracking of the brush, a deer sprang into view just ahead. Harry was greatly excited, but his nerves were steady. He instantly cracked away at the deer, and had the satisfaction of seeing the animal stumble and then fall. But to Harry's chagrin, as he rushed forward to secure his prize, the animal sprang to its feet, and, plunging into the brush, disappeared from his view.

By the sound and the movements of the brush, however, Harry was able to follow the deer for some distance. At struggle as he would in the dense brush, he could not keep up with the wounded animal.

Soon he could neither hear nor see any trace of it. After careful searching, however, he found its trail, and red drops of blood on the fallen leaves.

Following the trail as rapidly as possible he was led for a mile down the slope of the mountain toward a cañon. Pushing on he soon reached the bottom, where a small stream trickled over the stones.

Stopping to recover the trail, where it was lost among the stones and gravel, he suddenly heard a rustling in the brush just ahead of him. Looking quickly in that direction he caught a glimpse of the deer, which had evidently stopped to drink, and now, weakened by its wound, was slowly and painfully making its way up the opposite side of the cañon.

Harry did not wait for a fuller sight of the animal, but fired away at a venture, calculating the position of the animal's body. There was a crash in the brush as the wounded deer leaped forward with its last remaining strength and then fell over, struggling.

Harry rushed forward and was soon standing over his fallen prey, sheath-knife in hand. The dying animal looked piteously at him with its large eyes, struggled faintly and expired. Harry could not help feeling a pang of compunction at killing so beautiful and noble an animal. But that emotion soon passed away. As he had wandered about three miles from camp, and it was now after 5 o'clock, Harry was for some time at a loss to know what was best to be done. He did not feel able to drag or carry the carcass up the slope and through the forest to camp, and on the other hand he did not like to leave it for fear of its being eaten by some mountain lion.

While he was deliberating and considering the expediency of staying with the carcass all night, he heard a distant shout from down the cañon. Quickly answering it the shout was repeated. Harry then fired his rifle and called out.

It was not long before the form of his brother and Ben broke through the foliage in the bed of the cañon, and his cheery voice called out: "Well, Harry, what is it?"

"Deer," replied Harry, laconically, proceeding with the work of disemboweling the creature.

"Good for you!" exclaimed Ned.

"Lucky you happened along," said Harry; "it looked as though I had an elephant on my hands."

"I heard your first shot and then your second, so I came up the cañon. I came over the other ridge, about two miles below here."

"Guess we can carry it between us," said Harry, eyeing the well-rounded form of his prize with proud satisfaction.

"Course we can," replied Ned, leaning his rifle against a tree.

Having finished his work upon the carcass, Harry tied the feet together with cord, and, cutting a stout pole, thrust it between the feet in such a way that the deer could be carried suspended from the pole. Then the two boys, taking each an end of the pole on his shoulder, started joyously for camp. Resting occasionally, they reached there in about an hour and a half, and found Ben just kindling the fire for supper.

"Well, well!" he exclaimed; you boys will have to start a meat shop. How are we going to dispose of all this venison?"

"Dry it," said Ned, as he and Harry dropped their burden.

"He Aimed as Well as He Could in the Darkness."

"Who got this one?" asked Ben, looking from one to the other.

Ned jerked his thumb in the direction of Harry, who was taking off his cartridge belt.

"Honors even, then, so far," said Ben, smiling. He was very proud of his younger brothers.

After such a dinner as the boys had eaten, one would not suppose that they could want much supper; but mountain air and exercise are wondrous tonics, and even Ben was ready for more of the delicious venison steak. After a hearty supper, eaten by the camp fire as the twilight faded out of the western sky, the boys were quite ready to retire for the night. Before doing so, however, Ned climbed the pine tree that overshadowed their rustic shelter, and, with pieces of stout cord, hauled up the remainder of his venison, and the carcass of Harry's deer, and suspended them from strong branches at some distance from the ground.

"I hardly think any mountain lion or wild cat will climb this tree while we are so close," said Ned, as he scrambled down. Nevertheless, the venison was not as safe as he fancied, as we shall soon discover.

As the boys rolled themselves in their blankets, Jenny came and stood near their lodge, choosing that as her safest place for the night. "She'll wake us if any wild animal comes prowling around," said Harry; and the event proved that his confidence was not misplaced.

"Better keep our guns handy," said Ned, placing his rifle alongside his bed. "That's so," said Harry, following his brother's example.

Once before midnight, and again soon after, Ned roused himself and placed fresh wood on the camp fire, peering about in the darkness as he did so. The stars twinkled through the dark tops of the pines, and he heard the occasional note of some night bird, wheeling about in the darkness in search of prey. A cool breeze blew from the summit of the mountain, stirring the odorous pine branches. Jenny lay a few feet away, where the blaze of the fire flickered on her gray sides. Looking up into the tree, Ned saw that the venison had not been disturbed. Then, yawning and stretching his limbs, he again rolled himself in his blankets and fell asleep.

It was not yet daylight, though there was a faint flush in the eastern sky, when Harry suddenly found himself wide awake. He could see the embers of the camp fire glowing as the light breeze fanned them. He thought of rising to place some fresh wood on the coals, but just as he was about to crawl out of the lodge he heard a sudden snort from Jenny, and then a sniffing sound, which seemed farther away. Soon the sniffing was repeated, accompanied by a sound as of some animal moving over the pine needles.

Seizing his rifle, Harry crawled quietly out of the lodge, and, resting on his knees, peered into the darkness. Jenny crowded close up to him, evidently frightened.

Suddenly he saw dimly in the deep shadow of the pines a huge dark form skulking along, and heard the sniffing sound again, this time more distinctly. His first impulse was to waken Ned, but fearing that a sudden movement or word might frighten the creature away, he desisted, and only cocked his rifle in expectancy. He could not make out what kind of an animal it was that was prowling about, but he rightly suspected that it was some carniverous beast attracted by the smell of the venison.

Soon the dark form came nearer. Harry determined to fire. Raising his rifle, he aimed as well as he could in the darkness, and pressed the trigger. A blaze shot from the muzzle of the weapon, and the sharp report rang out on the still night air, startling Ned and Ben from their slumbers, and frightening Jenny so that she threw up her heels and bounded several yards away.

A savage growl was heard, and a tearing of branches. Suddenly the three boys saw that the animal, whatever it was, had turned upon Jenny. She, in her fright, raced around and around the pine trees, the brute chasing her. They could see her heels fly in self-defense, and hear her squeal piteously as the brute evidently tore her with its claws.

By this time Ned had his rifle, and both he and Harry watched their chance for a shot. As Jenny tore around in her wild panic, she came closer to the lodge, and the brute following her, growling savagely, at last presented a mark for the rifles. Both guns rang out together, and the animal stumbled and fell, Jenny escaping from his clutches.

As the unknown enemy rose, growling horribly, and tearing the bark from one of the trees with his claws, the boys gave him another volley. This time he fell over, and his fierce struggles soon ceased.

Jenny was still rushing around in the darkness, fearing to run far away from camp, and yet not daring to come near the monster that lay dark and horrible on the ground.

Ned and Harry now went boldly out and stepped up to their fallen enemy, while Ben threw some sticks on the embers of the camp fire, making a bright blaze. By its light the boys examined their prize, and to their great astonishment found that they had killed a large brown bear.

"Well!" exclaimed Harry, "I guess I'd better find out what I'm shooting at next time! That fellow might have made mince meat of me before I could finish him."

"They're pretty hard to kill," said Ned.

"Well," said Ben, examining the several bullet holes in the bear's carcass, "between you, you seem to have finished him."

"Yes," said Ned; "he's harmless enough now; but look at those claws! No wonder Jenny shrieked!"

"Poor Jenny!" exclaimed Ben; "I wonder if she's hurt much?"

Harry caught her, after some trouble, for she was thoroughly panic-stricken, and brought her to the firelight, where her wounds were examined. The blood was trickling from several long scratches on her flank, and on her hind legs; but she did not appear to be seriously hurt.

"Guess she'll pull through all right," said Ned; "hope so, anyhow, for we shall need her help, to get all our plunder home."

Of course there was no more sleep that morning. After breakfast Ned and Harry set about skinning the bear. They found this quite a task, but at length they accomplished it, leaving the head and paws attached to the skin. The brains and tongue and as much of the flesh of the skull as possible were removed, and the cavities well dressed with salt. Ned had acquired some experience in taxidermy before leaving his Vermont home, and proposed to prepare this bear skin for a rug, as he had those of the coyote and mountain lion, and send it to his father for a Christmas present.

After salting the skin, and rolling it together, they proceeded to skin the carcass of the deer Harry had shot. The two deer skins were then well salted and rolled up. The head of the buck was treated as that of the bear had been, Ned intending to mount it as an ornament for their lodge. The head of Harry's deer, a doe, was also prepared in the same way.

This work took up the whole of the forenoon, and the boys concluded to do no more hunting that day, but attend to curing the meat already on hand. They cut the venison and the best parts of the bear meat into small strips which they hung over a cord stretched between two trees. Then for dinner they had soup and a stew from the remnants of the meat and bones.

After dinner they lay on the fragrant pine needles and discussed methods for dressing the deer skins so as to make soft leather for trousers. The boys remained at this camp several days, dressing the skins and attending to the smoking and drying of the meat. During that time Ned shot a young doe, and two wild cats, and Harry shot a mountain lion and a wild cat. Taking care of these made considerable work for the boys, and when at last they were ready to leave they had a very heavy pack for Jenny. Accordingly, Ben suggested that they should take three days for the homeward journey, hunting by the way, saying that he was well enough to walk, if they could take the trip in easy stages. This was considered advisable by Ned and Harry, so they discussed the trail, and divided the journey into three somewhat equal portions, deciding where they should camp each night. This having been settled upon, the boys packed Jenny early one morning, and started on the homeward trip, casting fond looks back to the camp which had afforded them so much pleasure.

POLAND.

WORD-PICTURES OF A COUNTRY SOMETIMES CALLED THE THRESHOLD OF RUSSIA.

Look at your map of Europe, and find Riga on the Baltic Sea. Draw a line from the dot representing it to Dresden in Saxony; from Dresden to the mouth of the Dniester River, on the Black Sea; another from the mouth of the Dniester to Smolensk, Russia, and a fourth from Smolensk back to Riga. The space enclosed by these lines was at one time a large and powerful nation, with a territory greater than that of modern Germany, and for nearly a century her voice was an authority. Today this nation has no separate existence politically, but is a part of three great nations, Russia, Austria, and Germany.

This is, or rather was, Poland.

This part of the map has an added interest for the world just at the present time because of the fact that it is the European threshold of Russia, and it is across this Polish threshold that the world goes to Russia, and Russia comes to the world.

With very few exceptions, all the railroads that connect the Czar's empire with the rest of the world cross what was at one time the republic of Poland.

In the heart of the rugged green hills through which one of its rivers cuts its way toward the Black Sea stands a gigantic rock. The river flowing round both sides of it makes of it an island crowned by a citadel. Its Polish name is a hard word, as most Polish and Russian names are for English tongues. It is Kamieniec, meaning "City of Rock." This citadel had much to do with the fortunes of the Countess Potocka, whose face looks out at us from this page; but, before we hear the story, let us wander for a time over this country so little known, and yet, just now, like everything else that has any connection with Russia, of especial interest.

For three centuries the Polish kings were crowned at Cracow, and if you were to visit that city today they would show you an ancient fortress-castle called the Wawel. This is the Westminster Abbey of Poland, and for 700 years and more the greatest of her great dead have slumbered here. It is really a collection of buildings, cathedral, houses and courtyards, chapels and barracks, and around it all is a high wall with towers at the corners. The cathedral is perhaps one of the richest and most magnificently decorated in the world. Gold, silver, precious jewels, stained glass, costly carving, rare pictures, rich cloth in hangings, sculptures, and beaten metal, there it is in profusion. One of the tombs is thickly gilded with gold on the outside, and during one of the wars, this tomb was painted black, so that it should not be carried off.

Like most European cities, the central square of Cracow is the market place. A picturesque old place it is. In the very center of the square is one of the most interesting buildings in the city. In the early middle ages this building was known as the Cloth Hall, because of the fact that cloth was exhibited here. It is now used as a picture gallery, a reception hall and a museum. Every Tuesday and Friday is market day, and here the country people come to sell their produce, as they and their grandfathers and great, great grandmothers have done for hundreds of years. It is a pretty sight; the women in gay dresses, the fruits, flowers and vegetables, the quacking ducks, and crowing roosters.

Except on market days the old square sleeps contentedly in the sun, opening its eyes once in a while as the modern trolley car goes clanging across the market place, or listening drowsily to the musical note of the trumpet call from the church tower. Just outside the city is the monument to the soldier hero, Kosciusko. It towers nearly 400 feet above the level of the river, and is made of handfuls of earth brought by loving friends. The center or foundation was a small pile of earth from a battlefield, and all the nation brought handfuls, some from battlefields, some from home grounds, until it grew to its present height.

The churches of Cracow are very beautiful. One of them is gorgeous with gold, silver and precious stones. Its walls are covered with paintings of golden angels on a blue background. There are some 300 of them, no two alike.

What the Champs Elysee is to Paris, the Planté is to Cracow. It is a fine modern boulevard extending all around the city, with shaded walks, beautiful flower beds, and fine buildings to see. The old university, which celebrated its five hundredth anniversary in 1900, fronts on this boulevard. Here, too, are the new university, the building of the Society of Fine Arts, and many fine homes.

Another very important city of Poland is Warsaw. If Poland is the threshold of Russia, Warsaw is the door that opens from western Europe into Asia. If you will take your compass and draw a circle about the entire continent of Europe, you will find that the point of the compass rests at Warsaw, the geographical center.

Three-quarters of a million inhabitants, electricity, modern cars, splendid drives, fine theaters and parks—it is a second Paris. Everybody seems bent on amusing himself. At night the streets are a blaze of light, and a whirl of life and gayety. What the café is to Paris, and the beer garden to Germany, the little tea and cake houses are to Warsaw. They line the street, and here the citizen sits and sips his tea and munches his cake. And what do you suppose you call the person of Warsaw? The Polish W is pronounced like the English V, and you say Varsovian, instead of trying to say Warsawian, which is surely easier if one could only remember.

This city, too, has its old city market, much the same as it was 400 years ago. From the Royal Palace, not more than a stone's throw away, the last Polish king saw the execution of 30,000 Poles. Near the palace is the Saxon Garden, a beautiful park, where all Warsaw goes in the summer, and young Warsaw skates in the winter. Just beyond the present city limits are the park and palace of the famous Polish warrior king, John Sobieski, a lineal descendant of whom lives in Los Angeles at the present time, a great white stone building, with statues everywhere. There are fine universities and art buildings, and it has been called a city of musicians.

There are three important cities of ancient Poland, and the third and also the oldest is Gnesen. It is a quiet country place; that is to say, it is in the midst of a pleasant country, all lakes and hills. There are some 20,000 people, but, unlike the gay Varsovians, they are workers. They weave linen, they distill brandy, and deal in horses and cattle. Here in the Cathedral is buried the first Christian missionary to what is now Germany, who was killed by one of the heathen priests in 997.

On the way from Warsaw to Cracow is a town with a very hard name, and little else to interest travelers, except a famous church which is one of the religious rallying places of the world. From the very farthest limits of the ancient country the people make pilgrimages to its shrine. It means more to a Pole than St. Peter's at Rome, or the Savior's tomb at Jerusalem, and almost any summer morning acres of peasants may be seen, as one writer says, lying flat on their faces before the cliff or hill on which stands this church. It is an old fortress church, enclosed by a brick wall fifty feet high, pierced for cannon.

Poland has reason to be proud of her past. Copernicus, the Polish astronomer, was the first one to announce to the world the theory that the sun does not move around the earth, but the earth around the sun.

Chopin, the great composer, Paderewski, the Reszkes, and Sembrich, of whom we know so well, show what Poland can do in the way of musicians. Polish people have always been noted in music.

Sienkiewicz, the author of "Quo Vadis," and the three great novels, "With Fire and Sword," "The Deluge," and "Pan Michael," that tell of Polish life and history, is a Pole. He has a cottage in the Carpathian Mountains, where he spends his time reading and writing. Even in Russia he is read by more people than Tolstoi himself.

There are also noted Polish artists, but their names are so hard for English tongues that I will not try to quote them. The first foreigner to receive a gold medal at the art school of Versailles was the celebrated Polish historical artist who painted the interior of the church at Cracow.

The Poles are born dancers, and several of their national dances are familiar to us, such as the mazourka, and the polonaise.

THE COUNTESS POTOCKA.

THE COUNTESS POTOCKA.

HER LIFE IN POLAND, AND HER FAMOUS PORTRAIT BY AN UNKNOWN ARTIST.

In the new museum at Berlin, Germany, is a little drab-colored panel portrait on paper which looks as if it had been kept for a long time among the leaves of an artist's portfolio. It is a picture of almost matchless beauty. If the visitor turns to the catalogue, this is all that he finds:

"Portrait of the Countess Potocka (wife of Gen. Witt,) born at Constantinople, 1766, died at Berlin, 1823 (superior pastel portrait, artist unknown.")

Copies of this little pastel are common in our schools and in our own homes, but we can only imagine how the artist put heart and soul into the portrait, content to remain unknown in giving fame to the wonderful beauty of this face.

But the life of the charming woman who sat for the portrait reads like a romance, and is full of interest.

In the streets of a suburb of Constantinople it chanced one morning as the French Ambassador was taking his usual walk that he came upon a group of children. They were playing together, and quite likely he had met many such a group and passed them by unnoticed. But this time the great beauty of one of them, a little girl of twelve or thirteen attracted his attention. He asked her name. The little girl replied that she was Sophie, that her mother was a Greek, and lived in the quarter of the city assigned to the Greeks in that quarter, she was poor and [illegible] and had little real affection for the child [illegible] mined to pretend to be deeply fond of [illegible] should offer to take her, and so win from [illegible] sum of money.

"Tell your mother to bring you to the [illegible] d—'s palace at noon tomorrow," he said, [illegible] ran off with the important message to her [illegible]

There was excitement in the dingy [illegible] she called home as she told her story, and [illegible] more than willing to comply, for she [illegible] child's beauty had won the great man. [illegible]

The next day found her at the palace [illegible] she had expected, the Ambassador [illegible] child, to educate and provide for her [illegible] his own, and at the same time to pay [illegible] the sum of three hundred and seventy [illegible] first the mother made a great outcry [illegible] child, but only because she hoped to [illegible] of money. However, when she saw [illegible] derstood her schemes and would give [illegible] only too glad to sign the contract which [illegible] leave her little daughter and go away [illegible]

The girl was easily consoled for the loss [illegible] by her delight in her new home, and [illegible] was surrounded by servants and governesses [illegible] urally quick and bright, she soon picked up [illegible] sic and dancing, and the ways of polite [illegible] eign to anything she had ever been taught [illegible] had a sweet disposition and pretty ways [illegible] slow in finding out that she could [illegible] with her guardian. Very soon the whole [illegible] the Ambassador down, were under her [illegible] saying goes.

As for her guardian, at first proud of his [illegible] love her so much that at last he determined [illegible] her before some other suitor should win her [illegible] her away from him. She was now a young [illegible] he was trying to make up his mind how to [illegible] riage to her, when he was recalled by his [illegible] and ordered to France. Fearing a sea voyage [illegible] unpleasant for Sophie, he decided to go [illegible] overland, and in the hurry and bustle of [illegible] he said to himself, "I will wait until we reach [illegible] tiful Paris, and then I will tell her."

There was much danger in traveling [illegible] and he felt easier when they reached Poland [illegible] and were received at the castle gate of the [illegible] "City of Rock."

The commandant of the town at this [illegible] de Witt, a brilliant young soldier, not [illegible] and he received them with great hospitality [illegible] was far from blind to the beauty of the [illegible] girl. The Count belonged to the Polish [illegible] his dash and bravery had given him a [illegible] portance, and his courtesy in receiving [illegible] the travelers was an added charm. [illegible] ural thing in the world came to pass, [illegible] young Commandant were much together [illegible] with each other, and the older man, [illegible] this possibility, rested and thought of [illegible] they should reach Paris.

It fell to the lot of the young soldier [illegible] plan to outwit the guardian, for too well [illegible] that he wanted the beautiful girl for [illegible] Witt's life as a military man had taught [illegible] he laid his plans well. A grand hunt [illegible] dogs, horses and huntsmen, a fine [illegible] the Frenchman. Just at the last moment [illegible] official business demanding his attention [illegible] to give up the excursion, but took a [illegible] the company safely off.

The hunting party was scarcely out of [illegible] was great bustle in the castle. Skillful [illegible] bride, rooms were decorated, everybody [illegible] tire, flowers were strewn from the citadel [illegible] and Count de Witt appeared gorgeous [illegible] epaulettes and plume. A wedding procession [illegible] and they proceeded to the chapel, where [illegible] the Greek Church tied them so fast in wedlock [illegible] a French Ambassador and guardian could [illegible] knot.

One of the Frenchman's attendants had [illegible] and when he saw all the preparations [illegible] had his suspicions aroused and set off [illegible] his superior. Then the hunt was for other [illegible] riding was fast and furious. But De Witt, [illegible] sentry of the return of the Frenchman, [illegible] of the town closed against him, and he was [illegible] to stand outside and hear the chiming of [illegible] bells and receive again from his ward the [illegible] and seventy-five dollars which he had paid [illegible]

There were three years of happiness, that [illegible] peared on the horizon. De Witt proved to [illegible] thrift, and there were troublesome creditors [illegible] in the story there came upon the scene a [illegible] cer in the form of Count Potocka, who [illegible] head of a great political faction. He owed [illegible] and was forty years of age, but had never [illegible] had pretended to the throne of Poland, [illegible] ishment, part of his estates had been taken [illegible] he met the beautiful Sophie, he, too, fell [illegible] with her. It seems very strange to us, but [illegible] society was such at this time that it was [illegible] thing remarkable that Potocka should fall [illegible] and suggest that De Witt should procure [illegible] an inducement, a goodly sum of money [illegible]

TORNADO PETE.

HE WON A VICTORY OVER OTHER BOYS AND THEN ONE OVER HIMSELF.

By a Special Contributor.

...day, not very long ago, just as school was out,
...Tornado Pete rushed into the house, a veritable whirl-
...wind of animation. He shouted and waved his gay
...cap with such enthusiasm that his mother began to ...think the circus had broken loose, or the pot of gold at ...the end of the rainbow had been discovered.

...As Tornado Pete gesticulated, something dropped with ...a thump to the floor and rolled into a dark corner like
...a frightened spider darting into shadow. The noise of the ...occurrence distracted Pete, and he dropped to his ...knees and wildly began to grope and hunt.

..."It must have been the big 'glassee,' the biggest one
...in the bunch," he groaned. "Oh! where is it? Whoopee!
...There it is," and he held up for inspection a great glass
...ball that glistened like a diamond and glowed with ...various colors. "Ain't it a whopper? Ma, I've hit a ...mine. You won't have to work any more. I can sup-
...port the family." The little fellow's face was flushed with ...enthusiasm, and he threw his arms about his mother's
...neck to give her the customary after-school kiss. As he ...did so, more marbles oozed from his pockets and rolled
...pell-mell all over the room, while some darted out the ...open door into the garden, where they tumbled into the ...midst of astonished violets and marigolds.

..."Well, son, what have you been up to now?" Of course
...his mother was proud of her boy, but his actions and in...flections were so kaleidoscopic that she never could tell
...what was to happen next, and in this instance her face
...wore an expression which can only be described as ago-
...nized expectation.

..."Well, ma," said the young manager of domestic ...affairs, "I've been playing 'for keeps,' and I just cleaned
...up the whole gang. I got all Billy's agates away from him,
...all of Tom's glassees. Of course the 'dough babes'
...didn't amount to much, but I've got my pockets a splittin'
...with them. Just look!"

...With considerable caution, lest they escape and roll
...away, Pete began to unload his wealth into his mother's
...lap. First the three coat pockets were emptied, then he ...had to take marbles from the bottom of his sweater
...which he had pinned up with safety pins to form a sort
...of circular bag. Last of all, his trousers pockets were ...turned inside out. Pete looked at the heap admiringly.
..."Don't that an outlay," and Pete glanced into his moth-
...er's face, expecting the applause and appreciation he felt
...was his due. "Why, ma, I can get a dollar for the lot, and
...a dollar would go a long way toward buying butter and
...lard and baking powder and flour and beefsteak and ...things. An' if business keeps on a goin' at this pace, I can ...get a velvet dress that will beat anything that rich
...women ever thought of."

...But his mother looked serious. She didn't enthuse a bit
...and Pete felt dreary little chills creeping about his heart
...as he looked into her eyes.

...She realized his disappointment, and put her arms about ...him lovingly. "How did you say you got these marbles?
...Tell me all about it, dear."

..."Why, we played for keeps. The boy that beats, you ...know, takes the pile, and I beat every time. Billy Munger
...got awful mad 'cause I beat him. He thought he was the ...best player in school, and it did me good to see him
...double up his fists and scowl at me when I raked in his ...marbles. He didn't dare fight me again, 'cause he'd tried
...it onc't before, and I walloped him good. I tell you what,
...it's good to have muscle to lick some of them fellers with
...when they get gay. Billy cheated like fun, but in spite of
...it he couldn't do a thing, and I beat him all hollow. The ...other fellers saw him cheatin', and pointed their fingers
...at him, and he was so mad he just lunged into them as ...if they was so many punchin' bags. But look at the mar-
...bles, ma; ain't they great?"

..."Yes, they are very nice, dear, but don't you know that it
...is wrong to play for keeps—that it is just the same as
...gambling? Pete's eyes bulged out like the eyes of a deep-
...sea fish that has just been pulled into daylight.

..."But all the boys do it, ma."

..."It wouldn't make the wrong right if all the world
...played marbles for keeps. It is one kind of a gambling
...game, and you must never play it again."

...Having implicit confidence in his mother's judgment,
...yet sad—so sad with disappointment at his mistake, he ...packed his ill-gotten gains into his pockets and strode out
...to the garden fence and tossed them one by one into the ...street, where they rolled about for an instant in the hot
...dust, then, with a final quiver as of rage at the indignities
...bestowed upon them, they settled down into their own
...individual dirt nests. When it came to parting with the ...big "glassee" and the beautiful agates, Pete hesitated.
...There were unmistakable tears in his eyes. "I just can't ...let 'em go," he moaned to himself. A great struggle was ...going on inside this little bundle of humanity, lest the
...tempter influence him, he plunged his hands into his pock...ets and pulled them out—every one of them. Then with ...a vigor born of desperation and good intentions, he threw
...them swiftly and far. When this was done, his face wore
...a look of victory like that of a general who has won a ...mighty fight. Turning his back on the battlefield, he scam-
...pered as fast as his short fat legs would carry him to Rol-
...land's house, which was next door, and called to him to ...come and blow bubbles.

...Pete had a couple of new pipes, so white and clean they ...looked like mother of pearl, and he had some wonderful
...soap from the druggist's that was guaranteed to produce
...the very biggest bubbles on earth, as well as the most ...highly colored ones. The boys got a big bowl of water
...and made a thick lather with the soap, then they got a
...dry-goods box for a table and established themselves un-
...der a big eucalyptus tree. Then the fun began.

..."Gee! look at that," cried Pete as he blew a great bub-
...ble from his pipe; "ain't it a beaut? Looks like the sun-
...beams was shootin' right through it as if 'twas a target."
...The two boys suspended operations to watch the irides-
...cent ball float up and up and up. But at last it hit a
...leaf and split into an invisible nothing.

..."If things that bust up would never make no more muss
...than a bubble, there wouldn't be much musses to clean
...up," said Rolland philosophically.

...The fun lasted until the sun had gone to sleep, and old
...Night made the shadows so black, and the light so dim
...that the boys had to strain their eyes to see the bubbles at
...the end of their pipes. The bubbles were as colorless as
...the night, and the wind that whined dolefully in the tree
...branches swooped down and carried off the fragile things.
...Pete and Rolland played that the wind was Bluebeard,
...and the bubbles pretty maidens, which the old fellow took
...to a great cavern in the mountains which he had fixed up
...as a grand palace with glittering lights, silver and gold fur...niture, tinseled draperies, marble statuary, and scores of ...pages and servants in magnificent flowing robes all cov...ered with jewels.

...But Pete's mother rang the bell, and he had to go inside
...and wash his face and hands and get ready to eat (by the ...way, Pete hates water worse than a cat,) and just then
...Rolland's mother called him to go to the bakery, for com...pany had come unexpectedly to supper, so the two
...youngsters put down their pipes and ran away.

HOSEN AND SHOON.

THE SEASONS NOVELTIES SHOW GREAT VARIETY AND SOME FASCINATING PATTERNS.

By a Special Contributor.

Possibly the rumor which was afloat last summer and fall to the effect that stockings were going out was a mere pipe dream of some reporter, or an envious gibe thrown at society dames, but if there were any truth in the assertion, it is doubtful if the barefoot fad would be able to stand against the tempting array of stockings offered by the trade this season.

Never before has there been displayed such a fascinating variety of design. There are stripes that run lengthwise and stripes that run round; there are plaids and polka dots and combinations that cannot be described. There are stockings in brilliant reds, marked off with vivid green, and others in which somber hues are combined with exquisite taste; but by far the majority of the stockings, this year, are of pearl white with black markings. Many have tiny black polka dots scattered over them, forming a background for some distinctive design, of which a flight of butterflies extending from toe to ankle is perhaps the prettiest.

One style is of pearl white, with a stripe of black extending from toe to hem and bordered on each side with a close-set row of pansies in black; and the effect is bewitching enough to cause any woman to forsake nature and return to the stockings of her ancestors.

Another pretty design is four-leaf clovers scattered over a pearl white ground.

Besides these stockings in which the ornamentations are made in the weave, there are the old-time favorites decorated with hand embroidery. One of the newest things in this line is clusters of bachelor's buttons embroidered in blue silk with delicately shaded green foliage.

In silk stockings, plain black or white, with lace ankles, are still the proper thing, more elaborate designs in the lace pattern being the only innovation.

In shoes, 1904 offers to miladi many attractive novelties. Tan and white in walking shoes will be worn even more than last season by well-dressed people, while in black there is the Bulla tie, a design new this season, graceful in shape and made of a dull kid which is pleasing in appearance and said to be very durable.

Patent leather Oxfords are still great favorites, and the style for 1904 is made with a drop toe, i. e., the sole, instead of curving up at the toe, as in the past, drops so that the heel, ball of the foot and toe are absolutely level. Whether the change is for comfort, health or style, the designer sayeth not, but if you want to discover the up-to-date girl, watch for the drop toe.

The heels are still perilously high, and while the walking shoes retain the extension soles, they are pared somewhat closer than formerly. Toes are more pointed than last season, but provide for comfort by being slightly elevated, giving room for the foot in height instead of width.

Another of this year's favorites is a low shoe of patent leather with dull kid top. It is made on a new last, and is hand-sewed throughout. Suede is superseded by Castar kid and antelope leather. The latter comes in all colors, and the shoes are ornamented with buckles or bows to suit individual taste.

In dancing slippers there is an endless variety of combinations. One of the prettiest is of Castar kid with jet ornamentations covering the whole front of the slipper.

Then there are satin slippers with high French heels and long pointed toes, looking for all the world as if they had stepped out of our great-grandmother's musk-scented chest.

One who was not a lover, but only a woman, might well keep such a dainty piece of wearing apparel under a glass case, and pay it divine honors.

Rapid Disintegration of Unionism in San Francisco.

TRY NEW SCHEME.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 25.—The storm of protest raised by the action of the Milk-Wagon Drivers' Union—or rather by Alexander Dijeau, the Pooh Bah who runs that union in conjunction with the Scavengers' Union and his multiplicity of other business—has had its effect. It has so scared the main grafter of the union that the union has sent a communication to the Labor Council announcing that it never had the intention of entering into a combine with dealers for the purpose of raising the price of milk, and that, indeed, it had only the best wishes for the poor people who are compelled to depend on the Milk Dealers' Association for their lacteal fluid.

But for all the denial it remains a fact that the union adopted a resolution about two weeks ago proposing just such a condition and all the daily papers printed it as the result of the meeting of the union. When the Labor Council took a hand in the affair for the protection of the members of other unions, the milk-wagon drivers saw the error of their way, and speedily recanted.

There is a sequel to the story. The drivers have two strings to their bow still in reserve, and these strings will be pulled in order to get the desired raise in wages. When the drivers secured their raise from $60 to $70 last year it was accomplished by a corresponding increase in the cost of milk to consumers. Now the drivers want another raise to $80, and the new scale of wages has been prepared and submitted to the Labor Council for ratification. The council turned it over to the Executive Committee, and it will take the regular course, and will then be adopted. This is what should have been done in the first place, if the milk-wagon drivers wanted to be backed by the council, for that body is exceedingly jealous of its prerogatives, and will not indorse any movement in labor circles which has not first secured the sanction of that august body.

The Labor Council has made its grandstand play to the public regarding the increased price of milk, and now the increase will be made just the same. Right on the heels of this graft comes another from the same source. Dijeau is evidently getting ready for hard times. He is reaching out for money in all directions, and his latest move in this line is following the illustrious example of Pin Head McCarthy.

MUST ALL BE UNION.

The new move will be far reaching in its effect, and will bring trouble to all the dairies in the counties surrounding San Francisco. This new move is foreshadowed in a communication to the Labor Council from the Milk Wagon Drivers' Union, which announces that that body will work in conjunction with the Milkers' Union. The significance in this lies in the fact that the Milkers' Union has just adopted a new scale of wages and new rules for the coming year. This wage scale gives an increase and the new rules reduce the number of cows to be milked by each member and call for better quarters and better food. But the nub of the whole communication lies in the fact that all dealers in San Francisco must buy milk only of those dairies which are thoroughly unionized.

When it is remembered that in the outside counties there are no unions at the dairies, it will be seen just where trouble is coming from. All the San Francisco dairies are under complete control of the unions, and the owners are complaining that it is difficult for them to compete with the dairies in Marin, San Mateo and Alameda counties, because the proprietors there do not have to incur such heavy expenses as do the local proprietors.

About four-fifths of the milk supplied to San Francisco comes from the outside dairies, and if the rule is enforced all the milk from these places will be boycotted until such time as all the employés—the milkers, the cowboys, the stable helpers, and the drivers—are forced into unions. If the plan is carried to its conclusion there will be a milk famine in San Francisco until matters are adjusted.

But while the local unions are working for the organization of outside dairies they are not so eager to have their own membership increased, as is shown by a communication to the Labor Council from Thomas F. Marron, an employing dairyman. Marron tells the council that he is unable to employ a sufficient number of union drivers for his wagons. One of his union men left him and he cannot get another to take his place. He has an employé who is fully able to do the work, but the man is not a union man. He sent the employé to the Drivers' Union, with the requisite $50 for initiation fee, but the man was told that the union had as many members as it wanted, and he was refused admittance. The union has nothing personal against the man, but it wants a cinch on prices by keeping down the membership to the minimum.

LEADERS OUT OF TOWN.

The leaders of the labor circles are out of the city. Pin Head McCarthy has gone East on a jaunt at the expense of the State Building Trades Council. McCarthy is not a delegate to the national convention, as the council did not think it best to send him. But McCarthy wanted to go and he did not want to pay his expenses, while on the pleasure trip. McCarthy is nothing if not a schemer, and he soon found a way to get his per diem, mileage and salary all at the same time, while he was enjoying himself in the East. He announced to the Building Trades Council that he had received a telegram from the president of the National Building Trades Council, calling him East for consultation, and then away he went.

Secretary Wisler of the Labor Council was a little more honest than McCarthy. He wanted to go away on private business and he knew there was no way in which he could get his expenses paid, so he made the announcement that he had to go to Omaha to close up an estate, and he received a leave of absence from the Council.

But some of the unions are trying to stir up things because they see there is a chance to force their employers to accede to their demands. The Riveters' Union has compelled the Union Iron Works to increase the pay of riveters 50 cents a hundred, because there was a rush order on the warships building at the works. The Boiler Makers' Union, the Coopers' Union, and the Sheet Metal Workers' Union have all announced that they will make a new wage scale with marked increases, on account of the rush orders that have been brought out by the war.

Whether these unions will be able to accomplish anything until the return of the leaders remains to be seen, but it is given out quietly to the unions that it would be well for them to wait a while before making their demands. It will require the long heads of such men as Wisler and McCarthy to pull the new schemes through. At least this is what the friends of the two leaders are saying. It is understood that the Longshoremens' Union and the Stevedores' Union are also contemplating a move toward increasing wages and lessening hours, on the strength of the fact that the war in the Far East is going to make a rush of business from this port.

A MARKED REACTION.

But while the aforementioned unions are talking of increasing prices, there is a marked reaction in other labor circles. There appears to have come a lassitude in nearly all of the building trades, and it is notable that many of the members are beginning to think for themselves regarding the union situation. At a recent meeting of one of the carpenters' unions one of the members boldly announced his idea that the present unionization of San Francisco was not only a detriment to the city, but to the individual members of the various unions in the building trades. He said the whole amount of the thing was that the unions took from the members their individuality, and placed them on a par with the dubs and skates of the trades. It minimized the work of every man and if a man wanted to do something for himself in the way of advancement, he was kept down with the drones, and could never be anything more than a common laborer.

A case in point was cited. A rush piece of work was to be done in a certain establishment, and one of the men was asked if he could not get it out on time. He replied that he could do it easy enough, but if he did he would be fined by the union for doing too much work. He was offered a good bonus for the work, but said it would get all the other members of the union down on him, and was compelled to decline.

Such cases as these are having their effect in the unions, and there is much dissatisfaction expressed in many quarters. In fact, the disaffection has reached such a point that disintegration has already set in as will be seen by the rapidly increasing list of suspended members of various unions of skilled workmen. These suspended members, who are quoted as unfair, are men who have decided that they could do better work without the chains of unionism.

JUST FADED AWAY.

It may be remarked, in this connection, that two very promising movements, so far as labor circles are concerned, have faded away after a most spectacular appearance.

Some months ago it was announced that all the employés of the express companies were going to form an organization to be known as the Expressmen's Auxiliary. There were several meetings, and the newspapers were full of the new movement for several weeks. But suddenly there came a change over the spirit of their dreams, and now the Expressmen's Auxiliary is heard of no more. It develops that several of the most prominent members who were foremost in the movement, suddenly found that a spirit of economy had reached the express companies, which necessitated the cutting down of expenses and several employés were laid off. It was a strange coincidence that the men most prominent in the new movement were the ones who found themselves with more time on their hands than they knew what to do with.

About the same time the expressmen took it into their heads to form a union, the railway employés, including the clerks, the freight handlers, and all the big and little ones connected with the operating department of the various railroads centering in California, decided that it would be a good thing for them to have a union in order to enforce their demands. When the movement started there was not a hall in San Francisco big enough to hold those who were going to take part in the movement. There was a pyrotechnical display similar to that of the expressmen, and then there was the dull thud of the descending stick. Now almost any room in the city is too large to hold the handful of agitators who, being out of jobs, have nothing else to do but meet and denounce the greedy corporation which did away with their services when a wave of economy struck the roads.

It is hardly worth while to mention the passing of that famous organization known as the Newspaper Writers' Union. That combination of misfits and hangers-on of newspaperdom made a great splurge at first and went so far as to make threats against those who dared to oppose their organization. If any man who joined that organization has a job in San Francisco it is not known to reputable newspapermen.

LEADERS BECOMING UNEASY.

That this condition of disintegration is going on is well known to the local leaders of unionism, and the result is that the Macedonian cry has gone forth. The answer is now in the city in the presence of the national presidents of several organizations, who make nightly visits to the various unions, making speeches on the glories of unionism, and in every way imaginable bolstering up the waning cause. The president of the Structural Iron Workers of America is here, and is giving talks to men all over the city on the necessity of standing firm for the unions. He is the man who was downed by Sam Parks at the St. Louis convention, and as the members of the unions here think the Parks methods are just about right, Sullivan gets little attention.

Then the condition of the cooks and waiters is not exactly what the grafting local leaders desire and the president of the national organization received a hurry call from the Coast. He is here doing all he can to make the poor devils believe that the millennium is at hand for them. Incidentally he is also the head of the bartenders' organization for the United States, and his coming has put such backbone into the bartenders that over in Oakland the saloon keepers have been told that their business would hereafter be run by the union. The proprietors have not yet turned over the keys, but they have been notified that unless all the demands of the union are met there will be a boycott on their places.

A boycott on a saloon, by the way, is one of the funny things of unionism. There is a saloon on Geary street in this city, run by a man named Radovich. Radovich has no use for unions, or for men who belong to them. He is under the ban of the Bartenders' Union and of the Labor Council, but no one would ever know it from the falling off of business. People who want to drink do not stop to question the affiliation of the man who serves them.

Speaking of boycotts reminds me that the boycott is still on the Owl Drug Store which refused to take its advertisement from the Los Angeles Times. I was up there last evening and found the store crowded with customers. The manager told me he had never done so much business since the store was started. He has employed several new clerks, and still cannot accommodate his trade. His Saturday night trade, when laboring men are out, is said to be something marvelous.

MUCH TALK OF SPIES.

The organ of the Labor Council is overwhelmed with indignation because of the possibility of employers having spies within labor unions. The baseness of such a thing is animadverted upon at length, and no words of condemnation are too severe for the paper to use. There are two things that a labor organization, as at present dominated, cannot abide: Organization of employers, and employment by employers of union methods in fighting unions.

This spy system that the Labor Council opposes so strenuously is one of the mainstays of unionism. The whole body politic is permeated with it, and it is the open boast of labor leaders that they have spies wherever they can place them in order to know just where and when to strike hardest.

In the article mentioned the organ of the council contains this significant paragraph:

"Every week the Los Angeles Times contains an article, from two to four columns in length, written by its 'own correspondent' in this city. Careful reading of a few of these articles reveals the fact that the writer is thoroughly posted on the happenings in labor union circles in this city, and that he receives his information from men who believe him to be friendly. The Times' letters may be the work of a spy within our ranks."

Then follows the usual denunciation of The Times and its manager, for sending out a man who is able to give away the secrets of the charnel house of unionism. The paper mentions nothing of the efforts on the part of the unions to place spies in the employ of The Times, nor of the employment of spies to discover the writer of these letters. What is done in the name of unionism is all right, for it is their motto that the end justifies the means, in all things pertaining to labor unions.

It might be said in this connection that there is little need of any employer placing a spy on unions. There are too many honest men who have been forced into the unions in San Francisco, who are willing to tell all they know about what is going on. These men must either be members of the unions or their families must suffer for the necessities of life, but they are not willing members, and are glad to do all in their power to show up the rottenness of the bunch that leads labor by the nose in San Francisco. The unions do so many things openly that are despicable that their secret doings are of no importance.

CARMEN PREPARING TROUBLE.

The members of the Street Carmen's Union have made little noise in the past six weks, and the natural inference of the public is that everything is going smoothly with the union. The members generally, and the leaders especially, are doing all in their power to have this conclusion gain credence and are telling everybody that they have nothing to be righted, as they are getting along satisfactorily with their employers.

The truth of the matter is that the carmen are preparing for a struggle with the United Railroads, which they intend shall settle once and for all the questions involved in the arbitration, which ended so unsatisfactorily for the union last year. The union is accumulating a big defense fund, and the grandstand play made during the Chicago strike, when all the funds in the union treasury, amounting to something like $20,000, was offered to the Chicago strikers, was made with an eye to the future. It was a well-known fact here that the Chicago men would not accept the offer, and it was made with perfect safety, so far as the integrity of the fund was concerned.

Should the San Francisco carmen get into difficulties with the company there will be need of much money by the strikers, and it is confidently expected that the action of the local union in behalf of the men of the Windy City, will bear fruit, not only from Chicago, but from every other city where there is a union of street carmen.

The best information obtainable from the inner circles of the Carmen's Union leads to the belief that the middle of April is the time set for the test. The union will then make formal demand of all the mooted points which have been left unsettled. If the railroad company desires to arbitrate the union will refuse, and will demand an immediate answer, and acquiescence to all the demands of the men. If this is not done a strike will be inaugurated without giving the company time to get ready.

It is claimed that the long deliberation following the company's demand for time to consider, gives the road opportunity to prepare for the strike by importing men and supplying them with provisions and sleeping quarters. The plan for the April struggle is to have the whole matter brought to a head within forty-eight hours, and the men will go on strike before the company can do anything to forestall the movement.

PUBLIC PAYS THE BILLS.

It is not strange that the cost of building is high in San Francisco when the following figures, giving a comparison of wages paid per hour in San Francisco with those of Chicago and New York is studied:

	New York.	San Francisco.	Chicago.
Masons	$0.62½	$0.75	$0.80
Bricklayers	.62	.75	.80
Structural iron workers	.37½	.50	.56¼
Ornamental iron setters	.62½	.62½	.87½
Lathers	.62½	.50	.50
Tilesetters	.62½	.62½	.56¼
Plumbers	.56¼	.62½	.56¼
Steam fitters	.62½	.62½	.56¼
Gasfitters	.56¼	.62½	.56¼
Carpenters	.56¼	.50	.50
Stone cutters	.56¼	.50	.50
Marble cutters	.62½	.62½	.87½
Sheet metal workers	.50	.56¼	.70
Electricians	.56	.50	.56¼
Plasterers' laborers	.62½	.50	.87½
Masons' laborers	.35	.50	.50
Common laborers	.35	.50	.50

It will be noted that in each of what may be termed the absolutely necessary crafts, the San Francisco wage schedule is very much higher than that of New York or Chicago. It is no wonder there is a great cessation of building, and that many projected new buildings have been abandoned because of the excessive cost of construction. But the walking delegates must be paid—and the public must foot the bills.

LABOR NOTES.

Union painters have read the signs of the times. At a meeting this week they rescinded their previous action, and decided to postpone indefinitely their demand for an increase of wages to $4 a day. They had decided to make this increase effective on March 1, but have come to the conclusion that it is better to refrain than to suffer defeat.

Elevator operators are having trouble with the labor Mayor. Two good union men have been discharged from their positions at the Hall of Justice to make room for two non-union men, by the Board of Public Works, of which the Mayor's brother is president. To rub it in a little deeper one of the new men is a suspended member of the union and refuses to pay his dues and go back. One of the discharged men is a member of the union's executive committee. The union has revenged itself by adopting resolutions which say that the Mayor is not a union man.

Boycotts have become exceedingly unpopular lately. The work of the Citizens' Alliance is quiet and very effective. When a boycott is levied by a union the matter is investigated, and if it be found that the employer is within his rights, a counter agitation is set at work, and the business of the boycotted man increases as long as the antagonism exists. Labor leaders have discovered that the boycott is reactive and are slow to set the wheels in motion.

There is another effect of the silent work of the Citizens' Alliance which is making deeper inroads on the unions than is shown by the boycotts. It is noticeable that those members of unions, especially in the building trades, who have been forced into membership because their living depended on it, are becoming lax in their dues and are being suspended. The organ of the Building Trades Council prints a weekly list of "suspended" members who are ruled out for non-payment of dues. This list has almost quadrupled in the last month. The better class of workmen is the one affected. These men know that the reign of terror is drawing to a close, and they are stopping a useless expenditure.

It is reported that carpenters by dozens are dropping from the rolls of the unions. These men say that they cannot longer afford to be bound down to the position of mere machines because idlers, whose sole claim to artisanship lies in the fact that they can use a saw and drive a nail, want to be held on jobs. The leaven is working in the other unions of skilled crafts, and the disintegration is going on so rapidly that the return of Pin Head McCarthy is anxiously desired by his lieutenants.

AN ERRONEOUS STATEMENT.

In recent reports sent out to its clients by an Eastern information bureau purporting to deal with the labor situation in the several sections of the country, the statement is made that "In California unionism holds full sway; there it predominates as in no other part of the country, and employers are at a loss how to rid themselves of this unbearable burden."

As a general assertion this statement is erroneous, and is undoubtedly due to the exploitation of conditions in San Francisco. It is not only untrue as regards Southern California, but there is now warrantable doubt of its whole truth so far as San Francisco is concerned. The success achieved by the Citizens' Alliance in that city, and the internal strife among unionists and their political henchmen, have gone far toward alleviating the deplorable conditions which have existed in the Bay City, and it may fairly be said that employers are now less in the grasp of unionism than has been the case for many years, and are daily becoming more and more independent.

But in so far as it appertains to Southern California, the statement is wholly wrong. In proof of this we need only offer the record of building operations in Los Angeles and vicinity, the marvelous amount of railroad construction, and the general commercial and industrial activity. Capital has been attracted to this part of the State not alone by the remarkable investment possibilities here, but largely by the absence of unionism domination and by the independence of employers.

Los Angeles and its environs have been often named as the only places in the United States in which unionism has been thoroughly and effectually whipped, in which the walking delegate has been unable to gain a foothold, in which union despotism has been crushed beyond hope of recovery.

Therefore, Southern California has a right to protest vigorously against its classification among those sections in which "unionism holds full sway." Moreover, that statement is not true of California as a State, and in making it an injustice is done to the great commonwealth of the Pacific Coast.

Most emphatically, in California unionism does not "hold full sway;" it does not "predominate as in no other part of the country;" and employers are not "at a loss how to rid themselves of this unbearable burden."

The employers of Los Angeles and vicinity have learned how to rid themselves of the unionist burden. They have declared for the open shop; for the free and independent employer and laborer; for justice, fair treatment and the right to work when, where and for what wages one pleases; for the right of the employer to run his business in such manner as to him seems proper. The union totem is neither feared nor respected in Los Angeles and Southern California. The walking delegate is the laughing stock of the community; and the boycott makes business better for all against whom it is directed, and therefore is actually welcomed rather than feared.

This is how employers have learned to "rid themselves of this unbearable burden."

And what Los Angeles and Southern California have done, San Francisco and Northern California are gradually doing and will eventually accomplish. Forces are at work which will in time rid the city on the bay of its unionism scourge. Public sentiment is one of the most potent of those forces—and, disgusted by unionism's brutality, political trickery and vile tactics, public opinion is fast turning violently against the totem brand of unionism, which is the greatest disgrace now resting upon the Pacific Coast's splendid metropolis.

HEART OF THE MATTER.

Able Summary of Vital Objections to Labor Unionism as Now Constituted.

H. M. Lewis, in an able paper read before the Contemporary Club, Madison, Wis., recently, on the subject of "Trades Unions, Trusts and Crimes," gives an excellent summary of the main objections to trades unions. He says in part: "It is not my purpose to give the sickening details appearing daily in our newspapers, of the crimes, barbarisms and atrocities committed in the name of organized labor. The objections to these organizations may be summarized as follows:

"(1.) They take away the individual initiative and responsibility of its members, and from them to a large extent the hope and ambition to rise in their vocation, and of acquiring a competence or provision for old age.

"(2.) They limit the number of apprentices, and prevent many young men from learning trades and becoming useful and industrious citizens—but leave these young men, often the sons of members, to be idlers, vagrants and criminals.

"(3.) They increase the number of the unemployed, and thus become a direct and positive injury to the commonwealth.

"(4.) They incite lawlessness, riots, and disorders and disobedience to constituted authority. They foster the mob spirit and encourage insurrections against the state.

"(5.) In their opposition to the militia of the State, and army and navy of the United States, they must be regarded as in the nature of treasonable organizations.

"(6.) They hold and teach that allegiance to the union is superior to their duty and allegiance to their families, the church, the state, and nation.

"(7.) Trades unions are in opposition not only to the principles of the Christian religion as taught by Jesus of Nazareth, but to every ethical principle of right conduct between man and man as taught by the ablest thinkers and teachers of mankind."

AT THE THEATERS.

THROUGH the kindness of Manager H. C. Wyatt the beautiful Mason Operahouse has been donated tomorrow afternoon for a big benefit performance, the proceeds of which will go to the fund of the Robert E. Bell Sanatorium for consumptive actors. The cause is a worthy one, and many theatrical people, the Elks as a body, and numerous others have interested themselves in its success. While the project has been in operation only a year it has received donations of more than $20,000, and the instigators of tomorrow's performance believe that it will be the most profitable single testimonial yet offered.

The star of the afternoon will be Mme. Helena Modjeska, who will present the sleep-walking scene from Macbeth.

Every leading theater of Los Angeles is represented on the programme. James Neill and his entire aggregation will present the second act of "Nancy & Co.," a comedy which had a successful run at the Burbank a week since. The new Neill-Morosco company will appear in the second act of "When We Were Twenty-One," thus making two excellent offerings from Mr. Morosco's playhouse.

Clarence Drown of the Orpheum contributes the services of Stuart Barnes, a clever monologuist known to vaudeville audiences throughout the country; Thorn and Carleton, in an original bit of "joyfulness," and lastly Billy Van and Rose Beaumont, last week's Orpheum headliners, in a new comedy sketch.

Bobby North comes from Waldeck's Casino theater to do the first Hebrew impersonation he has tried in Los Angeles. Thomas Persse and Edith Mason render some operatic duets, and Rice and Cady intend to brighten the atmosphere with a German turn that is reputedly able to bring tears to the eyes of a potato.

Winfield Hogaboom sends the entire Elleford company from the Grand Operahouse. They will present an act from "Kidnapped."

Forrest Dabney Carr, well-known local basso, will sing the prologue to "Pagliacci."

Seat reservations are on sale at the Mason box-office exclusively, but tickets can be had at any theater in the city.

Burbank.

The new Neill-Morosco company opens its first engagement at the Burbank Theater this evening, presenting Nat Goodwin's famous vehicle of comedy, "When We Were Twenty-One."

For the past three months the management of the Neill-Morosco enterprises has been busily at work contracting these players, and they claim that the result of their efforts is one of the finest stock organizations in the West. Amelia Gardner is the leading woman, and Howard Gould the leading man. Therese Maxwell, late of the James and Warde company, is "second" woman, and Harry Mestayre is leading juvenile. He left the leading juvenile role in Chauncey Olcott's company to accept the Los Angeles engagement. Thomas Oberle is cast for "heavy" parts, and George Woodward and Phosa McAllister essay the character roles. H. S. Duffield, Robert Morris, Frank MacVicars, Elsie Esmond and Helene Montrose compriss the balance of the players.

"When We Were Twenty-One" is doubtless remembered here from the presentation of Nat Goodwin and Maxine Elliott. It is a clever, wholesome play, of which the following is a brief synopsis: Phyllis, chief character, is a beautiful girl just budding into womanhood. A mutual love springs up between her and a playmate—a young and rather reckless fellow, which on the part of the young man is merely a passing fancy. He later marries an adventuress, who discards him upon learning the condition of his financial affairs. After enlisting in the army he is seen no more. A man who had all these years been a staunch friend to both Phyllis and the Imp, as he was called, inspires in the heart of the young girl a love which he himself reciprocates. Their happy marriage brings the performance to an end.

Robert Morris is stage director of the new company. The only matinée will be given Saturday.

Casino.

"Hoity-Toity" has won popularity at the Casino Theater, and the past week broke the box-office records. Under the management of the veteran Blair it will be continued another week.

Edith Mason as "Lady Grafter" is a pleasing success, and she promises to introduce new songs tomorrow night. Robert North and Rice and Cady will continue their fun-making way, and Flossie Hope will reproduce her spectacular dances.

Matinée Saturday.

Orpheum.

One of the biggest hits of vaudeville is the striking act of "The Eight Vassar Girls," who will begin their engagement at the Orpheum tomorrow night. They have won enviable press notices in the North, and it is to be hoped they will do as well here. They do a spectacular musical act, containing among other things an electric ballet said to be original and fascinating.

The Werner-Amoros troupe of jugglers and acrobats is also billed for this week. Ziska and King are magicians said to have a European reputation, and who have never been seen in this country before their importation for the Orpheum Circuit. Harry Thompson, "Mayor of the Bowery," is an impersonator.

The holdovers are Van and Beaumont, presenting a skit called "Patsy's Dee Boo;" Thorne and Carleton, jesters; Snyder and Buckley, musical comedians, and Rice and Elmer, comedy acrobats.

Grand Operahouse.

The next offering at the Grand is a reputedly sensational comedy-melodrama, entitled "Kidnapped." It is by David Higgins, author of "Piney Ridge," "Yorktown Folks," and other successful plays.

"Kidnapped" is said to have had unusual Eastern success, and comes to the Grand with all its original stage effects. One of the principal scenes is the Brooklyn Bridge, showing three distinct views of East River at midnight. There is also a real patrol wagon drawn by real horses.

During the action of the play singing and dancing specialties will be rendered.

"Kidnapped" will open at this afternoon's matinee, and will continue throughout the week.

McIvor-Tyndall.

What promises to be a lecture of interest and instruction will be that given at Blanchard Hall this afternoon by Dr. Alexander J. McIvor-Tyndall. He will take for his subject "How Thought Can Kill," and will demonstrate that thought may be used in a manner to produce disintegration and death.

Dr. McIvor-Tyndall illustrates his lectures with psychic demonstrations of which perhaps he alone is master, made possible by long exercise and unusual development of certain mental faculties. He unites, however, a degree of practicability with his lectures, and is a pleasing entertainer. Last Sunday's audience could not be accommodated at Blanchard Hall.

Howard Gould.

Howard Gould, leading man for the Neill-Moroscos, comes to Los Angeles with a good reputation back of him. He has as evidence of good stage personality an athletic physique, a strong face, a voice of depth and power and grace of manner.

Last year Mr. Gould played with Patrick Campbell, enacting Michael, in "The Joy of Living" and Demetria, in "The Resurrection." Miss Suzanne Santijo was leading woman. The season was finished at Daly's famous New York playhouse.

Mr. Gould was with Daniel Frohman for seven years, playing leads in "A Colonial Girl," "The Prisoner of Zenda," and other plays of similar nature. He was the successor of E. H. Sothern in his starring ventures with these dramas.

Towle's Evolution.

George P. Towle, musical director of the Casino theater has an interesting story.

He began his education at the age of seven years by learning piano playing. He came into prominence in Boston, his home and birthplace, having studied under such European teachers as Lange, Buscovitz and others.

HELENA MODJESKA.

He was the original musical director of "San Toy," "The Telephone Girl," "A Gaiety Girl," and "A Runaway Girl." All told his endeavors with the baton cover a period of twenty-seven years. His work upon a chorus of raw recruits is something to watch with amusement.

His first lesson to a chorus was being given the other day when a Times reporter had just stepped into the quiet and darkened auditorium. Seating the entire group of girls in the orchestra, Towle at last climbed up on the stage, and, taking the center, went through the song himself at least half a dozen times. If there were girls who did not understand the special gestures, Towle did these with a thoroughness that left no room for doubt.

Stopping suddenly, he picked out a girl who had not been paying strict attention and invited her up on the stage beside him, asking her quietly to go through the song he had just been doing—then, woe to the lassie for her absentmindedness! It looked very like a Sunday-school class to see the rest sitting demurely in the pit before their huge teacher.

An Unfamiliar Story.

No name associated with the American stage is so widely known as that of Ada Rehan, yet she has invariably shrunk from every form of publicity. Her long career at the head of Augustin Daly's famous stock company made her famous beyond the lot of most stars, but in her private life she has moved so quietly that though the fame of her name still rings in England, France and Germany, as well as throughout America, the public knows less of her perhaps as a woman than of almost any other celebrity that might be named.

Ada Rehan was born in Limerick, Ireland, at the date that proves her twenty years younger than Madame Modjeska, and exactly one decade younger than Mrs. Langtry. Her father, a shipmaster, lost his all in the wreck of a vessel and came to American with his wife and five daughters when Ada was six years of age. He settled in New York City, where the future actress was carefully reared by a mother of unusual mentality and exceptional literary taste.

Ada was the youngest daughter. The oldest became the wife of Oliver Doud Byron, a well-known actor. During a school vacation, when about thirteen years old, Ada traveled with Mrs. Byron in a professional tour of cities and towns adjacent to New York. One night in Newark, a woman of Byron's company playing the part of an old hag in one of Byron's own melodramas became suddenly ill and the youthful sister, who begged earnestly for the opportunity, was powdered up and "sent on" for the part, acquitting herself creditably.

She was immediately returned to school, but her mind had caught the fever, and four years later she made her real stage debut at Macauley's Theater in Louisville. This debut occurred one month after Mary Anderson's, which had taken place on the same stage. The next year Miss Rehan was a member of Albaugh's Stock Company, of Baltimore, and the season following was made leading woman of Albaugh's excellent organization at Albany, N. Y.

Here she had opportunity of appearing with all the great players of the period as they came along in the "stock star" fashion of that day. She was very tall and beautiful, and progress was rapid for youth and beauty in those days. Before the close of her first season at Albany she had played Virginia to the Virginius of John McCullough, Juliet to the Romeo of Lawrence Barrett, and Ophelia to the Hamlet of Edwin Booth.

It was at this time (1873) that Augustin Daly first saw her. He was greatly impressed by her appearance and ability, and though he afterward described her as a "tall but rather awkward beauty in Albany," he promptly offered her an engagement as soon as he commenced the formation of his first New York stock company. Meanwhile Edwin Booth's attention had been specially drawn to her, and he almost simultaneously invited her to become his leading woman for the ensuing season.

This was a momentous situation for the young and ambitious girl. Booth was the great figure of the stage at that time and Augustin Daly, though respected, was comparatively obscure. She accepted Daly's offer however, as all the world knows, and her subsequent career, thoroughly familiar to all New York theatergoers, proved that the Fates stood behind her when she made this important decision.—[Washington Times.

Romance of the Stage.

Just at present, flitting between Paris and London, is the eminent lawyer, bon vivant, Bohemian and patron of the drama, Joe Redding. He is attending to Carrie Swain's suits to have the divorce of Frank Gardner from Annie Praham Gardner set aside and to secure a division of the Gardner fortune, which is said to amount to about $25,000,000. This bit of intelligence will awaken the interest of many actors in the profession who were in the West some ten years ago and earlier. It will recall memories of the Bella Union Theater thirty odd years ago, when the singing and dancing of Carrie Swain was an attractive feature of the bill. It will also recall some of the events of her subsequent meteoric career. On the Bella Union stage Carrie Swain appeared in a double turn with Sam Swain, and she claimed distinction as the first woman to do knockabout work. While she was doing "flipflaps" and "splits" for the edification of large and demonstrative audiences, there came to the city one Frank Gardner, a handsome actor, and at the same time there was appearing at the California Theater, as leading woman of John McCullough's Company, one Annie Graham, a beautiful woman and an excellent actress. Mr. Gardner and Miss Graham became such very good friends that busybodies began probing for incumbrances that might prevent their marriage, and sure enough they succeeded in bringing to light a Mrs. Frank Gardner, who had been Miss Clementina Derringer of Philadelphia until she wedded the actor in 1373. In 1875 he obtained a divorce, and then, one version of the story goes, he married Miss Graham in this city. It is another version upon which Miss Swain now bases her suit. It was in 1879 that the Swains, Sam and Carrie, joined the rush to Leadville, Colo., and they made friends and money in that "greatest mining camp in history." And it was while there, say the latter day gossips, that Carrie decided to pursue her professional career unhampered by Sam. She went to Chicago and was next heard of in San Francisco at Morosco's melodramatic house, and later at the Alcazar, when it was in its decline after Osbourne, Stockwell and Wallenrod had separated. She had a piece of property known as Cad the Tomboy, managed by Frank Gardner. Annie Graham's whereabouts at this period is not recorded, but she was not a member of the company. The play was put on tour and met with good success. In the year 1886 the marriage of Miss Swain and Mr. Gardner was announced in the papers.—[S. F. Dramatic Review.

When the attractiveness of Cad the Tomboy began to wane in this country Mr. Gardner and Miss Swain took it to Australia and in that country they waxed wealthy. By fortunate investments in mining stocks they accumulated millions, and Miss Swain now asserts it was always understood between them that they were partners in all those money-making enterprises. When they became multimillionaires they shelved Cad the Tomboy and went to Europe, where they cut a swath of splendor and extravagance that made some of the native spendthrifts green with envy. In Paris they purchased a beautiful home near the Bois de Boulogne, where they entertained lavishly. In suburban London they bought another estate and started a racing stable, which for a time was managed by Tod Sloan. About ten years ago came an estrangement between the pair. Gardner returned to this country and suit for divorce was filed against him by Annie Graham Gardner. No defense was interposed and a decree was granted. It is this divorce that Miss Swain, during a recent visit to this city, retained Mr. Redding to have set aside. Miss Swain asserts that in her suit Annie Graham testified she had married Gardner in 1873, whereas Gardner was not divorced from Clementine Derringer until two years later. Miss Swain alleges also that Gardner expended a large sum of money in order to facilitate the divorce suit of Annie Graham and that Annie Graham suddenly exhibited great prosperity after the decree was issued to her. By proving these allegations Attorney Redding hopes to establish the validity of his client's claims. To enhance the complications Gardner insists that he is divorced from Miss Swain and reports has it that he is now married to a French woman. Miss Swain's suits for a division of the Gardner fortune are pending in Paris and London. Another interesting feature of the romance of three contients is the announcement that Miss Swain intends to return to America and the stage and that a New York theatrical agency is now booking time for her. She intends, it is claimed, to return from Paris to New York some time next month and place herself at the head of the most pretentious burlesque organization that ever started on tour in the United States. She writes that she is on her way here from Paris. While here last summer she was well fixed financially, being rated as worth over a million.

QUIPS AND CUES.

Pearl Landers has made a hit as Ada Ignot in David Garrick at Proctor's, New York.

Eight scenic artists have begun on the production of "The Runaway King," in which William A. Brady is to present De Wolf Hopper. It is promised that the performance will be gorgeous in a spectacular way.

Joseph Hart and Carrie De Mar have changed the name of the musical farce which they have chosen to follow "Foxy Grandpa." The new title selected is "The Courteous Cannibal." "Foxy Grandpa" will continue on the road next season in either of its present stars.

In an address to a gathering of newspaper men some time ago Charles B. Hanford frankly stated the obligations which men of the stage as well as other professions owed in order to the press, and intimated that if Hamlet could be written today it would be of the newspaper rather than of the player. Hanford would say: "They are the swift and brief chronicles of the time. Your death you were better off with a bad epitaph than their censure while you live."

The Western "Prince of Pilsen" company has the agreeable task of opening the Chicago Studebaker theater this week. This establishment has been thoroughly overhauled and is the most advanced idea in theater constructions. The Pixley and Luders musical comedy is drawing nightly houses as large and enthusiastic as that which greeted it the first night in Chicago.

Peter Duryea, sagacious bachelor bon vivant and millionaire, has been sued for $50,000 for alleged breach of promise by Sarah Madden, who for several seasons was prominently before the public in well-known burlesques and comedies. Miss Madden declares that some years ago she met Mr. Duryea at a midnight supper party given by a mutual friend in Delmonico's and immediately fell in love with him. He, she says, responded to his own protestations of love, but is now smitten: During the first month of their acquaintance Mr. Duryea showered Miss Madden with flowers, candies and other attentions, she adds, but after she became ill he insisted on her giving up her role and occupying a magnificent country home in the Blue Grass section of Kentucky, near the historic old Lexington.

Barrie has scored over two of the latest works of the two leading English playwrights, "Letty" and "Mary," were produced within a few nights of each other, and in two boring theaters, but though the Pinero piece was withdrawn after a long, and rather creditable run of one hundred nights, "Little Mary" has passed one hundred and fiftieth representation, as Mr. Frohman calls it. Moreover, the popularity of the Barrie comedy shows no signs of waning. On the contrary it has just been refreshed with a new curtain raiser—a one-act play by Maarten Maartens, the Dutch novelist, which is called "The Bird."

American players of note rarely have to "rest" long in London. Belle Gilman, whose sprightliness failed to save "Dolly Varden" from disaster at the Avenue recently, has just been engaged to play the prima donna, in the coming revival of "Dorothy." While Blanche Ring, who is soon to appear at the halls, will have the leading part in "The Love Maker" at the Savoy. Meanwhile, Marie Tempest, who was seen first by Eastern playgoers in "The Cardinal," and who, Hilliard has been paid the compliment of selection by the Oxford Dramatic Society to play Beatrice in the coming production of "As You Like It."

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

WATKIN MILLS, celebrated English basso, will be heard in concert in this city early in April. Mr. Mills is a bass soloist well known in Canada, England, and all over part of the United States.

His voice is said to be powerful and well under control, and credited with mellowness of tone, wide range of expression. He has created principal roles in a number of the most important modern productions of recent years, and is lauded by some English critics as the greatest basso-cantante in England.

Blauvelt's Second.

It has been said of Lillian Blauvelt, who will sing again at the Mason Operahouse tomorrow evening, that no other living soprano has completely won the affections of the people of England.

Melba, Sembrich and Blauvelt are the leading exponents of "bel canto" today. So pliant, flexible and well trained is Blauvelt's voice that all difficult feats are performed with ease and facility that belies the difficulty.

Her programme will include well-chosen selections from the works of various languages: "Ah, fors' e lui" (Paradies;) "Batti, batti" (Mozart;) "La Danza," "Mondnacht," (Schumann;) "Der Morgen," (Greig;) "O Traum," (Liszt;) "Frühlingsnacht" (Van der Stucken;) "L' absence," (Gretry;) "L' absence," "Ah, mes vers," (Hahn;) "La Cadix," (Delibes;) "My Heart" (Degger;) "Roses after Rain" (Hermann;) "Irish Folk Song," "Sweetheart and I," (Buck) ("Romeo and Juliet.") (Gounod.)

Chutes.

The prelude from "Parsifal" will be the star offering of the bill at the Chutes this afternoon. "Parsifal" has had its fame heralded cast through the winter months, and the opportunity to hear this masterpiece under the baton of a masterful musician, Chaffin, is certainly of interest.

At the evening concert at the theater Miss Adaline Fowler will sing, and a number of popular classics will be given by the instrumentalists. As a director Chaffin has few equals, doubtless in the whole country. He is too much inclined to concern himself over the externals of conducting, however, and is so well drilled that there is no need to be sensational.

Star and Imperial.

At Simpson auditorium this evening, March 8, will occur the last event of the Imperial Quartette concert of the Mozart Club. Although the club members but four people, a number of unique instruments are used to advantage. For instance, Stoelzer, director, plays the saxophone, lute, bells and

Peter Duryea, sagacious and well

No. 156 Fifth Ave., New York.

DELICATE FAMILY PROBLEMS.

The admiration goes out voluntarily to the man or woman who lives on a basis of sound friendships with those persons who have been acquired by effort. It is not always the easiest thing in the world, though one of the things of importance, to command the good will and hearty liking of your husband's people or your husband's family, but when you can and do command it you prove thereby the possession of some very good qualities of mind and some very good methods of procedure, and you also show that you have more than a little concerning the things that make for popularity.

In the first place this most potently when you have married into a family between which and yourself no life-long friendship exist, or between which and yourself no prompt affinity is existent. Any young woman especially finds herself in just this awkward position. She weds a charming man, whose nearest relatives are unsympathetic, almost unfriendly, and who dislike her husband. Then the opportunity is brought conspicuously forward when she can and should show the quality of her breeding, and demonstrate just how much she knows of that most precious and delightful of irresistible science: The making of self agreeable in the face of social difficulties.

WEAPONS THAT WIN.

When the situation is such a one as I have outlined above—and with lamentable frequency I find that it does present—the wife in the case, with her self-esteem and her marital baptism to maintain, can wield one, and only one, set of weapons in order to win her way. She must take care to be tactful, not retaliatory, and she must use the never-failing profitable policy of the sweetest politeness.

"They don't like me, and I shall not humble myself out to make them change their opinion," I heard one bride angrily declare on her return from her first visit to her husband's family, and this visit, I judged from her statement, had hardly been a success.

She came over and sat down beside me and it was not long before I heard all about it. It was a very familiar story, but she looked greatly discomfited and not a little puzzled, too, when I made over its conclusion.

"Don't you think they were perfectly horrid?" she asked, agonizingly.

"No, they were not very kind or courteous, surely," I admitted. "But," went on, "I think you bungled your part of the contest, too. You made so many blunders that hurt their feelings quite as sorely as their behavior hurt yours, and then, as you are young and young, and in society, and clever, you ought to have used more tact; you should have been more patient and a great deal more polite and agreeable than you were. You are apparently not aware that it is more needed to be agreeable in the face of a little rudeness than to be respectful."

"I saw the sly retort that was on the tip of her tongue, and I forestalled it by saying, "I know, my dear, proof I speak, because I have had experience."

A WISDOM OF THE SERPENT.

"Now, when you are married your relations with your relations-in-law are, as a rule, and my marriage was no exception to the rule. My husband was a charming fellow, but his family were very stern, very proud, conventional Virginians, and I came from noisy New York. Throughout my maiden days I had frequently been told that I was a most attractive young person; I knew that I was popular, and I never dreamed that my manner could ever be other than delightfully ingratiating until I went to visit in my mother-in-law's home. Well, I confess to you, I received a shock. Everybody was civil, but it was as plain as could be made that they did not like me at all.

"At first I was astonished, and then hurt, and finally a good deal irritated. I had descended on the family prepared to be taken right into the bosom and made much of as a sister and a sister. But I was not, woman-wise, my first inclination was to fly straight to my husband's presence, and seek consolation.

"However, having some of the wisdom of the serpent, combined with a small deal of the harmlessness of the dove, I checked myself in time, and adopted one of the big mistakes that wives frequently make." I shut my confidante straight in the face as I said this, whereat she let her hang her head.

"It is not either good form or good taste to complain to your husband of how his family treat you. When you find a situation of this sort to cope with keep a stiff upper lip and your eyes look about as I did to as clearly and as clearly as possible just where the trouble lies.

FIXING THE BLAME.

"It was not very long in sitting on the private committee of investigation before I was aware that some of the blame for the strained relations between myself and my husband's family was resting on my shoulders. The things are rarely, as you know, all one side.

"I had never stopped to realize how much I had hurt the family pride when I had laughed at some of the ancestors' portraits, and failed to defer to my mother-in-law precedence in and out of the dining-room, and addressed my husband's elderly maiden relative as 'Jane' instead of 'Cousin Jane,' and annoyed my nervous sister-in-law inexpressibly by bringing her dogs to the table with me, and looked at the antiquated bonnet of a highly venerated neighbor; and in one and another had taken liberties with sanctified traditions and hurt sensitive feelings when I should have shown the utmost consideration and sweet thoughtfulness.

"That is where I find so many individuals, who are called upon to deal with the vexed question of their relatives by marriage, remiss and narrow-minded in their view of the situation. I should like to take all newly made wives aside and whisper low in their ears that the secret of success when making the acquaintance of their husband's family is to display toward every member thereof the most distinguished courtesy.

CONQUESTS OF A HOUSEHOLD.

"It is only fair to concede that a bride's new relatives, with rare and beautiful exceptions, regard her from a critical standpoint, and are much more eagerly on the lookout to identify her failings than her virtues. They are not apt to think that she is wholly worthy of the nice man whom she has married, and they have an ugly little way of magnifying her little mistakes into deliberately offered insults, when she may really be unconscious of having made them.

"But there is no American household, in which I have ever been, that is proof against the son's wife, who, stranger though she may be, seriously and secretly undertakes its conquest by dint of sheer courtesy. Her courtesy is shown by an exercise of the most gracious consideration when she visits her husband's people, or when they visit her, and her discretion is first made evident by carefully discovering, by previous cross-questioning of her husband, just what some of the leading family prejudices and habits are.

"There was a bride I have known who assumed the liberties in her mother-in-law's house that she enjoyed in her own home, and thereby brought down bitter criticism on her thoughtless head. She demanded breakfast in bed, shirked the church-going, gave orders to the servants, and otherwise presumed. She was so lacking in tact as to bounce into her seat at table before the blessing was asked upon the meal, whereas, with a little keenness of observation, she could have caused the wind of popularity to blow all her own way. Now, when you are visiting your relations-in-law be sure to do as they do. You are not so much their relative as their guest, and not matter if they rise at dawn and go to bed with the fowls, you should temporarily adopt their customs with a willing grace.

"Be punctual to the moment; make as few demands as possible; offer no advice or criticism, and listen to any that may be offered you with all smiling attention. You are not obliged to act upon it, but you can always receive it with an air of flattering interest that is just as satisfactory to the donor as though you were ready to put it to practice.

"When I had duly taken counsel with myself over the troubled question of my manner toward my husband's family, I followed the suggestions I have just laid down, and I found that they worked like a charm. I conducted myself as though I were visiting my good friends and not my own family, and thereafter I was welcomed in the home of my newly-acquired family with a warmth and genuineness that I could not doubt, and that I always enjoy."

MANAGING A MOTHER-IN-LAW.

"But, then, there is the problem of the mother-in-law," began my confidante. "Suppose she does not like you?"

"Oh, but she will if you go about her in the right way," I insisted, "and don't forget that she is your husband's mother, and therefore the rightful claimant to special civilities on your part. Learn beforehand the title by which she likes best to be addressed, and employ that always in speaking to her. Don't resent it because she weeps at your wedding, and looks more like the chief mourner at a funeral than one of the important figures on a festal occasion.

"If you have not charity for the feelings of others you have not really good manners, and some day you may be a mother-in-law yourself and know how it feels to see your son pledge all his love and devotion and life to another woman. Do not make another mistake, so common with young wives, of misinterpreting the natural reticence and somewhat chilly diffidence of your mother-in-law's manner, when she first meets you, into a deliberately given indication that she does not like you.

"Do not, in short, be either sensitive or suspicious. I attended a wedding only the other day where the bride made this common and unhappy mistake. Not until the day before the wedding did she meet her mother-in-law, a little old lady who had lived long in widowed seclusion in a small country town, and, as was natural, she felt dazzled and disturbed by the grand home of the tall, splendidly-gowned girl her son intended to marry.

"The fright made her stiff and silent, and the bride-to-be thoughtlessly interpreted this into evident dislike and a wish on the old lady's part to keep her at arm's length, and, worse still, into disapproval of her son's choice of a wife. In eager retaliation she treated the venerable lady with a manner that only thinly veiled her antagonism, and then the misunderstanding between them was quickly, deeply, and everlastingly rooted. Criticism has flown freely from either side, and wrought wounds that can never be healed, and that is a pity, because they are both of them admirable ladies, and their connection might easily have been made a most conspicuous success.

"The trouble arose from the fact that the bride knew nothing at all of the art of managing a mother-in-law. There is a way to manage her, and my one daughter-in-law knows how to do it. She was a stranger to me, and not a native of my part of the country, and I cannot say that I was charmed at the idea of my son's marriage. Like the major portion of mothers who have fine, tall sons, I thought no woman quite equal to the dazzling position of his wife.

"Frankly, I admit that I felt sad and shy and nervous at the idea of meeting this miss from California, who had won his heart, and when I saw that she was not beautiful or well dressed, I felt as though cold water had been dashed in face. But not so one moment afterward. She came forward to meet me with a beaming smile, saying, without any formal introduction:

"'I would have known you anywhere in the world as his mother, you are so like, and is he not the handsomest, finest, and best of men?' and with that she lifted one of my hands and kissed it with a little air of grateful deference that would have won the heart of the proudest Queen.

"I have never considered since whether my daughter-in-law is beautiful or well dressed, nor regretted her lack of fine features or taste in clothes, because I am so filled with pride over her cleverness in knowing exactly how to manage her mother-in-law."

LOVE

Often leads to poverty. No real woman ever sold her heart for the luxuries of life. But many a woman who has gladly faced poverty for the man she loved, may well doubt her wisdom when pain becomes the mate of poverty. If she were rich, she thinks, she could find a way of cure.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is within the reach of every one. It lifts the burden of pain which weighs down those who suffer from womanly diseases. It establishes regularity, dries weakening drains, heals inflammation and ulceration and cures female weakness.

"You have my heartfelt thanks for your kind advice to me," writes Mrs. Geo. Fletcher, of 101 Victoria Avenue, Galt, Ontario. "Was troubled with catarrh of uterus for over a year. The doctors said I would have to go through an operation, but I commenced to use Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription and 'Golden Medical Discovery,' also his 'Lotion Tablets' and 'Antiseptic and Healing Suppositories.' Now I am completely cured, after using six bottles of Dr. Pierce's medicines. I am glad to say his medicine has made me a new woman."

Weak and sick women, especially those suffering from diseases of long standing, are invited to consult Dr. Pierce by letter, free. All correspondence is held as strictly private and sacredly confidential. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

THE COUNTRY SCHOOLHOUSE.

The little country schoolhouse—you
Remember it; of course you do!
Within the angle snugly set,
Where two long yellow highways met,
And saplings planted here and there
About the yard, and boxed with care
As if to typify, in turn,
The youngsters caught and caged, to learn.

Around the rolling pastures spread,
With woodland patches garlanded,
From which the breezes glady bore
Sly invitations to the door.
Across the sills the bees' soft hum
Was mingled with the muttered sum,
And from their covert in the vale
In plaintive pleading piped the quail.

With basket and with pail equipped,
Clear-eyed, tan-cheeked and berry-lipped,
Athwart the pastures, down the road,
They trudged to learning's poor abode:
The pink sunbonnet, broad-brimmed straw
The bare brown feet that knew no law
Of fashion's last; the bundled forms
That laughed aloud at cold and storms.

What tales the scarred desks might relate
Of triumphs gained with book and slate!
What lore the clapboards loose possess
Of feats at noontide and recess!
And doomed how oft the panes to see,
Back up the road, and o'er the lea,
Haste boy and girl new worlds to find,
The little schoolhouse left behind.

Oh, little country school! In vain
May critics hold you in disdain.
The greatest lessons that you taught
Were not by chalk and pencil wrought.
As oped your doors on fields and sky,
So, likewise just as wide and high,
You opened to the eyes of youth
The principles of love and truth.
—[Edwin L. Sabin, in Youth's Companion.

"Can you repeat the table for dry measure?"

"Yes. Two pints make one quart; two quarts make one jag; too many jags make one disreputable."

"Nonsense. I was speaking of dry measure."

"I was speaking of extra dry."—[Kansas City Journal.

Newest Drapery Stuffs and Laces

True to the Various "Periods"

"Period" decorations, draperies, furniture and floor coverings have become most important in thefitting up of a modern home. An inexpensive den may be contrived that possesses all the charm of some long-ago fashion, or some decorative scheme peculiar to the old Virginia, the Spanish, the Indian or the Empire modes.

In selecting our assortment for spring our buyer went to New York in quest of the latest and most authentic goods, yet it was necessary to actually import some French, Indian and Japanese goods in order to make our lines complete.

If you desire to furnish a room in accordance with any "Period" you will find us able to supply the goods and also the designs. Our Mrs. Bancroft is an authority and an expert in designing harmonious furnishings that are true to the "Period" they are supposed to represent. We will furnish sketches, estimates and complete plans, including not only the draperies, but the wall coverings, carpets, furniture and bric-a-brac. Thus a striking Mission effect can be had here or an elaborate Empire scheme.

Among the important new additions to our line are a number of new styles in Velour, among them some charming new Rennaissance designs, Louis XVI stripes and Orsini Monotones. Among tapestries we show good assortments of the Louis XIV, Louis XV and Louis XVI styles, together with Gothic, Verdue, Florentine Persian and English effects. Among them are the famous Liberty goods from London, which are used principally for covering walls.

We imported a large assortment of beautiful French Cretonnes in very striking, yet harmonious color combinations. Then, too, there is a large line of fancy Japanese Crepes imported direct. The new Shiki silk in solid colors is really an Indian material, but it is especially pleasing in Mission decorations.

Lace curtains of all the different "Periods" are also here in abundance, so that any room from the hall to the bedroom can be draped in a becoming manner and in accordance with any "Period" desired.

Annual Clean-up Sale

At 1-2 to 1-4 Regular Prices

Hereafter these sales will be a regular occurrence at this time of the year. In our framing department there are necessarily many remnants of mouldings which must be cleared out of the way at some price or other. All such remnants have been used in framing up a large number of choice pictures which will be sold at prices ranging from ¼ to ½ the regular prices. The prices range from 25c to $25.00, and most of the pictures are sorted into lots at the various prices. There are

Choice Lots at $1.00, $2.00 and $3.00 and the pictures in these lots are worth from two to four times more. There are pictures for every room in the house—parlor, den, library, living room, bed room, dining room. The subjects include everything from a dainty black-and-white sketch up to an imposing landscape in colors. This sale is held directly after inventory for the purpose of ridding our stock of all remnants of mouldings. The mouldings used are of course the newest and best because the most popular mouldings are first reduced to remnant qualities. All kinds are included. THE TRAINING OF CHILDREN.

TALKS WITH PARENTS.

BY WM. J. SHEARER, A.M.

ENCOURAGEMENT AND INDIVIDUALITY.

THE majority of parents are disposed to take it for granted that it is natural for children to do what they should. Therefore, if they do right, they are not commended. It is taken as a matter of course. If they do wrong, someone is ever ready to criticise unkindly, if not most harshly. Too often the criticism is also quite unjust. This is all wrong. Too much effort and time are spent in trying to correct the wrong by harsh means. Too little effort is made for the purpose of leading into right paths by kindly encouragement.

Young children have no knowledge of what is right and what is wrong. All they are to know upon this subject must be learned by instruction, or from the examples of others—with whom they come in contact. Since this is so, we should not be so ready to accuse children of doing wrong purposely, or of deliberately giving pain.

DIFFERENT WAYS OF CORRECTING.

Consider the case of a boy who has broken a valuable vase, perhaps carelessly, and therefore liable to punishment. The parent calls the child to answer. "Ralph, did you break this vase?" He answers promptly, "Yes, papa, I did." Many a man has faced death at the cannon's mouth with less moral courage than this boy. Is it any wonder that, in this particular case, the parent commends by saying, "My dear boy, you are brave. You are noble. The value of the vase is as nothing compared to the prize I put upon your truthfulness. Many a boy would have told an untruth, knowing that no one saw who broke it. Now I know I can trust you to tell the truth at any time and under all circumstances." Will anyone doubt that he boy's bosom swelled with pride? He never forgot the lesson. Seven years have passed, yet, to this day, he has never given the parent reason to believe that he is anything but perfectly honest and truthful.

In the last case mentioned, suppose that, after the boy had acknowledged breaking the vase, the parent had punished him severely. How unjust would have been such treatment! There was evidently no intention to break it. There probably was not even more carelessness than could justly be expected of a lively boy five years old. Would not such treatment tend to make any child untruthful in every case, where he thought he would be likely to escape? Surely, no one will doubt that the influence of the first-mentioned method upon the developing character, would be infinitely better than if the second plan had been used.

THE UNIVERSAL TENDENCY.

The great trouble is that the almost universal tendency is to pass, without notice, the many times the child tells the truth and does right, and to deal most harshly with him the time he yields to the natural temptation. The child may treat a younger brother or sister with kindness twenty times and receive no word of commendation. He is sure to receive a scolding, if not worse, if the twenty-first time he forget himself and act naturally, by reason of the imposition of the younger child. Is not this all wrong?

A WORD OF WARNING.

Let all be watchful and praise what is right, rather than continually find fault with what is wrong. This is of vast importance in training to proper conduct. However, parents should guard against indiscriminate commendation. When used without good reason, the tendency is to make the child vain and to do more harm than good. Praise what is really praiseworthy. Do not praise that which requires no effort of the will or moral rectitude. Even with the cross, surly, ill-natured child, this method will certainly give the most excellent results. It is hardly necessary to say that a child should not be told that he is ill-natured or that he is bad. Such senseless treatment will surely ruin. Watch long, if necessary, for some pleasing act and then commend most heartily.

REWARDS.

Many make use of rewards of all kinds. One trouble with giving rewards is that many fail to distinguish between hiring and buying children. For example: Upon leaving home for a number of days, the writer expressed the hope that his boys would do as they should. Had he wished to hire them to do so, he would have promised them some certain prize for good behavior. This might or might not have produced the desired result. When he returned he inquired concerning their actions. The report being most satisfactory, he called the boys and asked them to go up street with him. There he purchased a fine penknife for each one. In the evening he told them why he had done so. Until that time they had no idea of the reason. Thus the boys learned that their determination to act as they should was not overlooked, even though no promise had been made. In such a case, it is very important that improper conduct certainly result in disappointment.

What has been said about hiring children to do as they should must not be taken to indicate that this should never be done. Indeed, many times it may be well to agree upon a price for a certain amount of work. This will act as a stimulant and all through life they will find that only as the result of work done, can they expect pay. It may be deemed a proper thing for parents to sometimes buy children to do as they wished. Though certainly wrong in principle, yet it is better both for the parent and the child, than a system of management by harsh threats and brutal punishments.

DIFFERENT EFFECTS OF TWO WAYS.

Some yet assert that there is no practical difference in simply rewarding a child for what he has done, and paying him a promised amount. However, is there not considerable difference? In the first case, the doing of the right thing is associated with pleasant results which were not anticipated. Thus doing right is made more attractive, and future conduct is more likely to be such as it should be. The child will be able to develop a spontaneous tendency to act from a sense of duty, rather than from the desire for certain pay.

In the other case, the child will feel that he has performed services for a fixed reward. If he does not wish the reward, he is apt to feel he need not do as directed. If he does as he is told he is apt to feel that the reward belongs to him and there is therefore no sense of obligation to do right because it is right.

RESPECT INDIVIDUALITY.

Every parent who has more than one child should not fail to understand that no two children are alike. In physical, mental and moral characteristics they differ widely. The same treatment will not answer for any two. The principles of management may be the same, but the application of the principles must be modified by the individual peculiarities of the child.

Since children do differ so widely, why should parents strive to treat all alike? Such treatment will crush the individuality out of any child. This individuality parents should strive to make a guide to the child's education and training. Too often it is considered as something which the parent should strive to overcome entirely.

The great effort which is made in school and at home seems to be to make children more uniform. Yet, who will give any good reason why a person should labor to produce uniformity of taste, of character, of ability or of aspirations? Is not individuality of far more importance than uniformity? Is it not the divinity of the child? Should it not be sought for and discovered, that it may be carefully studied, and, when along right lines, lovingly guarded? Does not biography teach us that only those have become distinguished who have developed a love for work along particular lines? Is it not time that parents, limited in power and by conditions, cease striving to overcome the Almighty?

Let no parent forget, then, that, in the beginning, every child differs from every other child in many ways. If it could continue to be alone it would always be different from almost every other child. But the child comes in contact with others and is thus continually trained to be more like others.

Every parent should carefully study each child and endeavor to find wherein the child is peculiar. He should aim not only to find out the child's good points, but his faults, as well; for this is equally important. The parent who can discover these peculiarities can hope for success in correcting those which should be corrected. The physician who is not able to diagnose a disease will be just as powerless to cure the patient as the parent will be powerless to correct faults in a child, if he does not see clearly what the faults are.

HOW PECULIARITIES MAY BE DISCOVERED.

Since it is so important that parents fully understand each child's peculiar faults it may be well to consider how these faults may best be discovered. Some faults may be discovered by careful study and observation. Others will best be learned by giving heed to the kindly criticisms of friends. At other times criticisms of friends or enemies lay bare some of the weak points of children. While neighbors are always impartial critics, they are often more reliable, as to parents. This is because parents are very apt to be strongly prejudiced in favor of their own children right. It is most natural that they did not defend their own children, what would do so? However, it is well to have the opinions of others.

One reason for desirable acquaintance of others in discovering faults is found in the fact that children are so prone to overlook the faults of their own faults, which are so plainly appearing in their children. Children learned to excuse themselves for being inconsistent they often excuse their children. It is very many honest parents fail to see that certain acts of their children are, in reality, deserving

NOT HEALTHY FOR TRUSTS.

Monopolies Aren't Favored in Sister Republic.

Proclamation of Neutrality a Brief Document.

Waning Glory of Carnival of Other Days.

BY EDWARD C. BUTLER.

[STAFF CORRESPONDENCE OF THE TIMES.]

CITY OF MEXICO, Feb. 21.—The collapse of the so-called sugar trust of Mexico is pointed to as an incident proving the declaration that trusts do not flourish in this country. Even the letter of the law is against them. Article XXVIII of the Federal Constitution, of February 1857, the Charter of the Mexican Republic, reads as follows: "There shall be no monopolies nor trusts of any sort, nor shall any prohibitory enactments be allowed in protection of any industry, except as relates to the coinage of currency, to the mail service and to the privileges, for limited periods, granted under the law to the inventors or perfectors of any patented article."

Aside from this fundamental inhibition, which may or may not be strictly enforced, it is unhealthy here for monopolies and trusts. The tobacco trust, projected by New York and London parties, last November, failed. Now the Sugar Trust has gone into "voluntary (or rather involuntary) liquidation" this week. It was organized about a year ago. The sugar trust finds itself confronted with liabilities amounting to $7,200,000 against assets estimated at $7,770,000. This would leave a margin of $570,000 on the right side were the assets as good as the liabilities, which they are not. They include valuation more or less arbitrary on the sugar stock, which sugar men say cannot be realized, especially as the supply is in excess of the demand and the new crop will soon be harvested. This may knock the bottom out of the market. As a going concern supposed to command unlimited influence and resources, the trust has failed to control the market and sustain prices, and will be even more handicapped under the enforced liquidation.

Up to last Tuesday, it seemed as if the crash would come in the nature of bankruptcy proceedings, but three of the richest members of the trust, Messrs. Saturnino Sauto, Ramon Fernandez and Ramon Suarez, personally assumed the liabilities and the matter was settled out of court. Among the liabilities is $3,000,000 owing to the city banks. Among other reasons for the collapse is assigned the materialization of the American-Cuban reciprocity treaty, which many persons supposed would never become effective. At any rate the Sugar Trust bit off more cane than it could munch.

BRIEF ON NEUTRALITY.

The following announcement from the Department of Foreign Affairs, promulgated on the 16th inst., is self-explanatory.

"The diplomatic representatives of Russia and Japan, accredited to the Mexican government having notified this department of the existence of a state of war, between the two nations in question as from the 10th inst.; in view of all the circumstances of the case, the President of the republic has declared that the government of Mexico ought to observe and will observe toward this conflict the strictest neutrality.

"The President also directed that the foregoing decision be communicated to the proper parties and that it be published in the Diario Oficial in order that it may be duly complied with.

[Signed] "MARISCAL."

This is a brief statement, compared with the elaborate neutrality proclamation issued by the American government in which the rights and obligations of citizens of the United States as belonging to a neutral power are fully set forth. But it will be borne in mind that Mexico is in every way protected from the conflict and never likely to be drawn into it and very few Mexican citizens are likely to be involved. The statement of Mexico's neutrality, therefore, is a matter of form and courtesy, much more so than that of the United States, directly affected by the war and whose citizens may be tempted to throw in their lot with either Russia or Japan. The Japanese legation in this city is receiving constant telegraphic advices as to the progress of warlike operations in the Far East.

Historically Japan is of interest to Mexico from the fact that in the XVIIth century the first Mexican martyr, (a Catholic prelate by the name of San Felipe) was put to death in Japan in the persecutions against the Catholic church in that island kingdom. In honor of San Felipe, a modern church has been built in this city, on Calle San Francisco, in front of the aristocratic Jockey Club, a building constructed of stone, and quite handsome. This is the only Catholic church erected in this capital in modern times, and is a very fashionabe temple of worship.

How far the proclamation of the Mikado of Japan recalling Japanese from foreign countries will become operative in Mexico, is not yet evident, but as a matter of fact these industrious little people are coming into Mexico in great numbers, fo work on plantations, especially in Southern Mexico.

A contract was last week entered into between the Boleo Company and the Japanese Mexican Commercial & Colonization Company, whereby the latter agrees to supply the former with 500 Japanese laborers. This contract is one of the most important of its kind ever entered into in this republic, and if the experiment, for such it is, proves a success, it may be taken that the labor question in this country is settled, once for all.

The arrangement between the two companies is that the Japanese laborers shall continue to work for three years at least, their wages being at the rate of $1.50 per day. Japanese inspectors, foremen and cooks are to be employed for the men, who are to find their own board, while the Boleo Company has to provide house accommodations, water, etc.

The Boleo Company is the owner of immense copper properties of the same name in Lower California. Its stockholders are principally French, the Rothschilds being among them. The production of the company's mines is limited by the number of laborers that it is able to obtain from time to time. At present the company has only 2500 men a work. In times it has had fully 4000. If the first batch of laborers gives satisfaction, it is the intention of the company to largely increase their numbers at an early date.

NOT SO MUCH CARNIVAL.

The glory of carnival has departed from Mexico City, although in the City of Merida, on the Yucatan peninsula and at certain other points, the three days' festivities of last Sunday, Monday and Tuesday were observed with something of the original splendor. In colonial times this city was en fete during carnival week and immense processions, headed by the Viceroy and at times bearing the sacred doll known as the Virgin of Remedios, passed in solemn state through the thoroughfares of the Capital, while cannon boomed and church bells rang out the lenten presage. Later, after Mexico had achieved her independence from Spain, the pre-lenten festivities continued as gay as ever, but instead of the Virgin of Remedios, the honored guest on processional occasions was the National Virgin of Guadalupe, the patroness of Mexico. After the year 1857, when President Juarez secularized church properties and divorced church from state, for some time the Catholics,—who necessarily predominated in Mexico,—celebrated carnival, but under the laws of reform were not allowed to have religious processions in the streets, and gradually the season has been losing its religious side, as manifested in public, and has been taking on more of a social and civic aspect.

Special services were held Sunday in the cathedral and in other Catholic churches and on Monday and Tuesday business was practically suspended. On Tuesday the Paseo de La Reforma was thronged with people in their best and there were many coaches gaily decorated on parade.

PROTECTORS OF ANIMALS.

The Mexican Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals was formally inaugurated Wednesday afternoon, in the handsome parlors of the Jardin Hotel. Judge Ignacio Sepulveda acted as chairman and Edward C. Butler as secretary. The constitution and by-laws of the new organization, which had been prepared mostly by a committee composed of Messrs. Arnold Marburg, Thomas Lakeside Phillips and E. C. Butler, with the assistance of Notary Public Ortiz, who gave his services free for the Society, were adopted. The idea of the Society, briefly stated, is to assist the authorities in the apprehension of violaters of existing laws relative to the treatment of animals: to solict additional legislation to that end, to distribute suitable books, pictures and literature among the schools, and otherwise promote the mission of consideration and protection for the dumb creation, especially horses, dogs and poultry.

There were forty-one persons enrolled on the membership, the first named being Mrs. Diaz, wife of the President, followed by the names of the American Ambassador, his family, the Belgian Minister and other diplomats, and nearly $400 was subscribed at this initial meeting. At the election that followed the adoption of the constitution, the following board of directors was chosen: Judge Sepulveda, Chairman; Col. Mariano Degollado, Maj. Robert B. Gorsuch, Rev. Father A. M. Hunt-Cortes, Thomas Lakeside Phillips, Arnold Marburg, J. A. Dwyer, George I. Ham and Edward C. Butler.

Among the interested people present was Mrs. H. C. Reynolds, the worker in S.P.C.A. circles. She came from Washington, D. C., many months ago, and in the face of what seemed insurmountable obstacles has thus seen realized the purpose of her mission.

FOR THE WORKINGMEN.

"The Department of Foreign Affairs of this Government has recently received communications," says the Mexican Herald, "from Mexicans of the frontier States who go to the United States under contract to work there, and then do not find things as they expected to and want to come back to Mexico. This they cannot do, because their contracts have been made for some definite time and they are forced to fulfill their obligations.

The Department of Relations, so it is said, cannot take steps in the matter, except that of notifying the United States authorities so that they may punish both the labor contractors and the workmen contracted, because the United States laws expressly prohibit immigration under labor contracts.

But in order to stop this state of affairs, it is planned to prevent emigration of Mexican laborers so far as possible. Among the measures contemplated, is that of compelling every workingman who wants to leave the country, to provide himself with a passport. Then, if he has been or is to be contracted to work, a clause providing for his return to Mexico at any time he wants to, is to be embodied in the contract, the contract to be sanctioned both by the United States Consuls and the Department of Foreign Relations. By this means labor contracts may be made so that they do not imply an infringement of the United States laws, and workingmen contracted will no longer have any ground to complain."

NOTES AND PERSONALS.

Arthur E. Stillwell of Kansas City, Mo., president of the Kansas City, Mexico and Orient Railroad, will arrive here about the first of next month, to consult the Mexican government with regard to the construction of the line from Topolobampo to El Fuerte, a distance of 100 miles. The construction is about completed and when completed the government subsidy will become due.

A concession has been granted this week to Wenceslao Garcia for the construction of a railroad from the city of Oaxaca to Tlacolula with a branch line to Tlalixtac. Surveys will commence at once. The road will facilitate access to the famous ruins at Mitla, thirty miles east of Oaxaca, some of the most interesting in the republic.

R. M. Baruch and wife and E. L. Norton, all of New York, and who have been at Los Angeles for some time, came in over the Mexican Central on Friday. Mr. Baruch, who is a Wall-street broker and interested in the Pan American Railway scheme, expects to remain here for several weeks.

El Diario Oficial or government organ of the 20th inst., says that with regard to the republic of Panama, the government has approached the various governments of the American continent, but has not as yet acknowledged or recognized that republic.

George W. C. Drexel, the Philadelphia editor, is here, with his daughter and a small party of friends. They reached Vera Cruz in the yacht Alcedo, and after remaining here a week will go southward visiting points in Central and South America.

Mexico may soon have communication with the United States by wireless telegraphy. The De Forest Wireless Telegraph Company is establishing stations at points along the Atlantic Coast and the Gulf of Mexico, and may establish stations at Tampico and Vera Cruz.

Mulford S. Perry, of Claremont, Cal., his sister, Mrs. H. P. Seymour of Whiting Point, N. Y., and his nephew, F. P. Oliver of Lisle, N. Y., constitute a pleasure tourist party who are at the Palace Hotel. They will spend about a month in the republic.

The Department of Foreign Affairs this week received advices that Sir Chentung Liang Cheng, at present Chinese Minister Plenipotentiary at Washington, has just been appointed Minister to Mexico, and is expected here in a few days to present his credentials.

Charles Staples, who for several years has been private secretary to Gen. Clayton, the United States Minister, has resigned his position to assume the duties of manager of the Cosmopolitan Club.

T. Y. Callahan of San Francisco, a timber dealer and owner of timber tracts on the Pacific Coast, is in the city.

Arrivals in this city: Charles J. Lex, Mr. and Mrs. M. P. Snyder, Los Angeles; S. R. Johnson, Mrs. S. R. Johnson, San José; W. S. Blair, Santa Barbara; C. H. Enkle and wife, Santa Barbara; A. G. Hausen, F. J. Blackburn, San Francisco.

On April 5, a meeting is to be held in this city of the merchants who are engaged in tropical cultivation on the isthmus of Tehuantepec and in the southern portion of the State of Vera Cruz.

H. W. Seager of New York, interested in the manufacture of sugar plantation supplies, has just returned from an extended trip through the districts of Tehuantepec and Chiapas. He says that entire district is being plantifully sprinkled with Americans and American methods. A number of new sugar mills are in evidence, including a sixty-ton mill under construction at Cardenas. He is of opinion that the sugar production in this country will be practically doubled in the next two years. He visited the line of the new Pan-American Railway being built by Los Angeles and Nebraska people from the isthmus to the frontier of Guatemala, and reports it as progressing rapidly and satisfactorily, the constructors anticipating completing the section from San Geronimo to Tonela within ninety days.

Col. W. J. DeGress, chairman of the Depositors', Committee of the defunct International Bank and Trust Company of America, says that after having examined the books of the bank in company with the government inspector, the committee is of the opinion that the assets of the bank are large enough to insure the payment of all the depositors' accounts.

Dr. John B. Fattic of Anderson, Ind., and Dr. H. R. Tanner of Kankauana, Wis., connected with the Rio Tamasopo Sugar Company, of which Col. Russell B. Harrison is president, have just arrived from Tamasopo, accompanied by a party of people interested in the venture. The sugar property comprises 6000 acres, lying within a mile and a half of the Mexican Central station at the village of Tamasopo, at an altitude of 1000 feet. The Hacienda lies in a crip between two rivers. A modern water-power sugar mill is to be erected very soon. Nearly 60,000 coffee trees on the plantation are from eight to ten years old in full bearing, and besides the coffee they have 5000 banana trees, 1500 orange trees, as well as lemons, limes, and other fruit trees, with oak, cypress and cedar in large quantities. The plantation is about one hundred and fifty miles from San Luis Potosi and one hundred and twenty-five miles west of Tampico. The cattle lands of the plantation are said to be very productive.

THE "HOME OF THE PEOPLE."

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE TO THE TIMES.]

BRUSSELS, Feb. 6.—Steinlein, the famous French artist, has just offered to paint the walls of that remarkable Socialist stronghold here, the "Maison du Peuple" (or the "Home of the People,") with frescoes representing the Apotheosis of Labor, thus adding interest to a building that is already one of the most interesting in Europe—from a sociological viewpoint, at least. This new "Home of the People" has succeeded a very small one which housed what was originally an ordinary workman's club. Cooperative trading soon began to form a feature of the scheme, however. Bread making has been from the commencement one of the principal industries, and the institution now keeps two bakeries busy in different parts of the city, 100,000 loaves being the daily output of one, and 95,000 of the other. These loaves are sold at less than half a cent each, yet the profit on this branch of industry alone amounts to 169,200 francs a year. The parent building contains stores for all the other necessities of life, with many branches in all parts of the town and even in the provinces.

The Maison du Peuple stands at the angle of the Rue Joseph Stevens, on an irregular piece of ground and on a slight slope. The difficulties which the architect had to meet were therefore great, but M. Horta, who is one of Belgium's most distinguished designers, acquitted himself well and has made the Maison du Peuple architecturally, as it is commercially, one of the sights of Brussels. It comprises recreation rooms, offices for the administration, a large café, a sitting-room, a large ball room, a smoking room, a butcher's shop, a grocery and a large dry goods store.

Those who buy at the Maison du Peuple receive a division of profits at the end of every six months, the amount being 5 per cent. on dry goods, etc., 6 per cent. on groceries, and 3 per cent. on bread. The members are carefully looked after and watched by the organization, and, though liberty is the watchword of the Socialist party, it is constantly held up as reprehensible for any working man or woman to purchase daily necessaries outside the Maison du Peuple or its branches. The leaders, in fact, endeavor as far as possible to boycott all the small tradesmen who are not members of the society.

The Maison du Peuple fills the place of a club as well as supplying all material wants, and the working man of Brussels with Socialist tendencies spends all his spare time there. Medical attendance is given free in some cases, in others at greatly reduced rates, and everything imaginable is done to bind the members together. The café is free for anyone to use, but well-dressed visitors are looked on rather sourly. Excellent concerts and entertainments are given, at which many of the best artists who sympathize with the dull lives of the poor willingly give their services. Unfortunately politics is not excluded. Here strikes are arranged, and inflammatory speeches delivered. It was here that Sipido and his friends arranged the attempted assassination of King Edward, then Prince of Wales, and it was this building that was the fortress of the Socialists and Anarchists, serving them as barracks and hospital, during the riots of 1901, when Brussels was put under military law, and many people were shot.

MEXICO, 20 de Febrero de 1904.—Ya se ofuscó en la ciudad de México la gloria antigua del Carnival. Durante los tiempos coloniales la ciudad revestia un esplendor que ahrora ni se aproxima. Pasaba por las calles ricamente adornadas la procesion eclesiastica y civica precedido por el Virrey y cargandose en hombros de personajes ilustres la Virgen de Remedios, la Patrona de los Españoles. Mas tarde, cuando México se habia librado de la dominacion Española, hubo las mismas procesiones, el mismo repique de companas y estruendo de cañones en saludo solemne, como en el dia de Corpus, pero ya encabezaba la comitiva la Virgen de Guadalupe, rival de la Española. Despues del año de 1857, habiendo el inmortal Juarez divorciado para siempre la Iglesia del Estado, cesaron las manifestaciones populares y publicas, limitandose los actos religiosos al interior de las mismas iglesias. En el época actual se limita la festividad precedente al Cauresma a servicios extraordinarios en los templos, la clausura de casas de comercio, y en el Miércoles de Ceniza, dia primera del Cuaresma, los sacerdotes pintan sobre las frentes de los devotos una cruz. La cruz se pinta con las cenizasde palmas benditas que se juntan en el Domingo de Ramos y son quemadas.

La Sociedad Méxicana Protectora de Animales fué formalmente instalada el Miércoles en la tarde en los salones hermosos del Hotel Jardin. Se matricularon cincuenta miembros, escabezando la lista la Señora Carmen Romero Rubio de Diaz, la distinguida esposa del Presidente de la Republica, seguida por las familias del Embajador Americano, el Ministro Belga y muchas personas vivamente interesadas en la abogacia y defensa de los animales tan comunmente maltradados en México. Fueron recibidos en suscricion cerca de $400 y parece que en numero y poderio financiero la sociedad cuenta con éxito extraordinario. Los siguentes caballeros se designaron como Junta Directiva: Lic Ignacio Sepulveda, un antiguo Californiano, como presidente de la Junta y como vocales los Señores Mariano Degollado, Robert B. Gorsuch, Rev. A. M. Hunt-Cortes (sacerdote católico) Thomas Lakeside Phillips, Arnold Marburg, J. A. Dwyer, George I. Ham y Edward C. Butler.

El dia 5 de Abril próximo se verificara en esta capital una reunion de comerciantes y hacendados interesados en el cultivo de productos tropicales en la parte suriana de México. Muchisimos Americanos han formado colonias en el Istmo y todos expresan contentamiento en conexion con sus empresas.

La Republica de México proximamente tendra comunicacion por el telégrafo sin hilos con los Estados Unidos. El sistema de estaciones costeñas que ya se extiende de Nueva York hasta Habana (Cuba) se extedera a Vera Cruz y Tampico, puertos Mexicanos. Las señales podra ser observadas a la distincia de 150 millas de la costa.

La proclama de neutralidad promulgada por el Gobierno de México el dia 16, es brevisima y por consiguiente tiene contraste marcado con la de los Estados Unidos. Pero, por otra parte los intereses Méxicanos en el Oriente son insignificantes comparados con los intereses Americanos. Mas bien, van muy pocos Méxicanos al Japon y aun ménos a la Rusia, pero a este pais estan llegando muchisimos Japoneses para trabajar en las secciones agricolas de la Republica, especialmente en los distritos prodigalmente productivos de Chiapas y del Istmo Tehauntepecano. Encuentran alli casi la misma configuracion mantañesca, las misma clima y suelo y por tanto la misma adaptabilidad para el cultivo de productos del Japon Suriano. Tambien los Japoneses estan pasando por centenares a la Baja California para trabajar en las minas de cobre. Ganan $1.50 per dia en lugar de ser limitados a diez centavos como en el Oriente Extremo.

LEWIS AND CLARK.

WINTER 1805-6 AT FORT CLATSOP.

It was just a month after sighting the ocean that they camped at their winter's quarters. In the meantime, it had rained continually. Having no shelter, the storm not only discomforted them but soaked all the merchandise, spoiling the dried fish, decaying the robes, and rotting most of their leather clothing. The natives asked such an immoderate price for the fish and roots that the party decided returning up the river to winter, however, the desirability of being by the sea, both for the warmth and the manufacture of salt, swung the decision in favor of a camp near the river's mouth. They had come down on the Washington side; but as the Indians said there was more game in the Clatsop woods, they crossed as soon as the high waves would allow their canoes to negotiate a safe passage.

Their admiration for the Pacific was not dimmed by the steady downpour. On December 1, Clark wrote, "24 days after we arrived at the Great Western Ocean (I cannot say Pacific) Ocian as I have not seen one pacific day since my arrival in its vicinity, and its waters are roaring and petially breake with emence raves on the sands and rockey coast tempestuous and horiable."

By December 7, 1805, they pitched camp in a thick grove of pines about two hundred yards from the river, and began immediately to build cabins for the winter. The hunters went in quest of game, and the others, although many of them were sick from the continuous wetting day and night, worked from the daylight in the pouring rain. By Christmas Eve, their huts were ready to be occupied; and, although they had to be shared with the disgusting fleas, they lent a sense of comfort the company had not experienced for months.

The shelter brought such a relief that they celebrated Christmas to the limit of their ability. Lewis leaves a description of the day: "We were awakened at daylight by a discharge of our arms, which was followed by a present from the men, as a compliment to the day, the return of Christmas, which we have always been accustomed to observe as a day of rejoicing. After breakfast we divided our remaining carrot of tobacco, which amounted to twelve carrots, into two parts, one of which we distributed among such of the party as make use of it, making a present of a handkerchief to the men. The remainder of the day was spent in good spirits, though there was nothing in our situation to excite mirth and gayety. The rain confined us to the house, and our only luxuries in the course of the season were some poor pork, so much spoiled that we ate it through sheer necessity, a few roots, and some spoiled fish."

Clark noted that, though far from home, he was not forgotten. "I received of present of Capt. L. of a Shirt, Draws and Socks, a pr. mockerson of Whitehouse, a small Indian Basket of Gutherich [Goodrich,] two tails white weazils tails of the Indian woman [Sacajawea,] and some black root of the Indians before their departure."

The men seized every excuse to try to be happy, and so of New Year's day, 1806, Clark has to record: "We were awaked at an early hour by the discharge of a volley of small arms to announce the new year. . . . The only mark of respect which we had it in our power to pay to the selibrated Capt. Our repast of this day, tho' better than that of Christmas consisted principally in the anticipation of the 1st day of January, 1807."

During the three months passed at Fort Clatsop, most of the men hunted, to lay in a supply of food for the trip homeward. Elk and deer were the most common game, and these were in poor condition. The skins were used to make new clothing and moccasins. A salt-making camp was established on the ocean beach and not only furnished enough salt for their daily use, but twelve gallons extra to take eastward. This was relished by the men, who had sadly missed it as they came

In early January, a whale was driven up on the beach. Its blubber was a pleasant variety to their lean fare, and the mere fact of going to view the enormous fish (for to them it was not an animal) was a great excitement in the monotony of labor and rainfall. Apropos of the whale, Clark writes, "I . . . thank Providence for directing the whale to us and think him much more kind to us than he was to jonah having sent the monster to be swallowed by us in lieu of swallowing of us as jonah's was."

From their notes, the leaders wrote clear descriptions of all the new animals, plants, and minerals they had met since Fort Mandan. Capt. Clark also drafted a "map of the country through which we passed from Fort Mandan to this place." To its details, he adds, "We now find that we have discovered the most practicable and navigable passage across the Continent of North America. It is the route which we traveled, with the exception of that part of our route from the entrance of Dearborn's River into the Missouri to the entrance of Travellers' Rest Creek into the Flathead or Clark's River. The distance between these two points would be traversed much more advantageously by land." Here he is in fact at Fort Clatsop, without having seen the path, he described what is really the most direct land route. So correct was his topography that it is almost exactly the road Lewis took on the return.

The captains had intended to remain at Fort Clatsop until April 1, in hopes a trading vessel would arrive and give them merchandise in exchange for a letter of credit; but the game was fleeing to the mountains and there seemed a prospect of the rain giving out, the continuous inclement weather brought an epidemic of influenza and colds, added to some cases of venereal troubles and a few accidents, left few well men in the party; so in March, they decided to hasten their departure. They believed that traveling would be good for the men, encouraging a change of thought as well as of climate.

On March 23, 1806, they started on their homeward journey. They did not leave two men, as they wished to divide the party on the return and the entire force was small. Besides, they concluded that they would reach home before any trader could round the Horn.

Of clothes, they had a goodly supply, made during the winter; of food but a small quantity; and as merchandise to procure both provisions and horses on this transcontinental journey, only some "needles, thread, vermillion" and "six blue robes, one scarlet, a coat and hat of the United States artillerry uniform, five robes made of our large flag, and a few old clothes trimmed with ribbon."

They left with the natives a plan of their march there and of their intended return, and several lists of their autographs. To these last was prefixed "The object of this list is, that through the medium of some civilized person, who may see the same, it may be known to the world, that the party consisting of the persons whose names are hereunto annexed, and who were sent by the government of the United States to explore the interior of the continent of North America, did penetrate the same by way of the Missouri and Columbia rivers, to the discharge of the latter into the Pacific Ocean, where they arrived on the 14th day of November, 1805, and departed the 23rd day of March, 1806, on their return to the United States by the same route by which they had come out." It is interesting to note that one copy fell into possession of Capt. Hill of the brig Lydia and finally reached the United States via Canton, China.

FROM FORT CLATSOP TO CAMP CHOPUNNISH.

Returning, they found the portage of the rapids and the falls more difficult than the descent had been. The natives, too, by constant robbery exasperated the company so that Capt. Lewis, on April 21, kicked one out of camp and threatened to shoot any others caught pilfering. Above the falls, they secured horses, and traveled overland to the Clearwater River. This was a great saving of time over following the curves of the river. On the plains, their food was jerked elk and dog flesh, and their fuel, grass and willow twigs.

On May 9, they reached the tribe with whom they had left their horses the previous fall. These Indians, and for that matter the Walla Wallas lower down, were honorable and obliging, a great contrast to the despicable savages of the lower Columbia. They had been looking forward to the return of the white men for more reasons than one. Capt. Clark had administered some eye-lotion to one of the tribe, and it had proved so efficacious that all the nation now wanted to be treated by the healer. As Clark's prescriptions or drugs were only given in exchange, the party reaped many a day's provisions from this faith. Clark writes of his practice, "We cautiously abstain from giving them any but harmless medicines; and as we cannot possibly do harm, our prescriptions, though unsanctioned by the faculty, may be useful and are entitled to some remuneration." He seems to have been very successful, even in cases where his journal records his doubts about the treatment given. Indeed, the doses he forced on his own men and the severe measures used with Cacajawea, lead us to wonder that some of the party did not succumb to the physician's care, if not to the hardships of the trip. While Clark attended to his patients, Lewis held councils and made treaties with the different tribes.

AT CAMP CHOPUNNISH.

As they ascended the Clearwater, the evidences of winter's stronghold in the Bitterroot Mountains were very discouraging. The natives warned them that they could not cross the heights for over a month; and, after investigation, they camped among the Chopunnish or Nez-Percé, in what is now Idaho county, Idaho. Here, they remained from May 13 to June 10, the longest stop they made at any one spot besides the winter's quarters. They built temporary huts of willow poles, with the crevices stuffed with grass. Fuel was abundant and there was sufficient game for their present needs and some in excess for their trip over the snowy regions. The men were sent among the Indians to trade for roots to supplement this meat for the mountain fare. The merchandise was divided among them, and it was found that the capital of each was "1 awl, 1 knitting pin, ¼ onz. vermillion, 2 needles, a few skeins thread, and about a yard of ribbon." Precious as this store was, four men lost their shares, two by capsizing in a canoe, two by their horses sinking. Then a new fund was created. Buttons came off clothes, tin phosphorous boxes and old vials were polished up, and new doses of eye-water and basilicon were concocted. These were bartered for horses and a sufficient quantity of food for the days ahead.

CROSSING THE MOUNTAINS TO THE EAST.

On June 10, they left the hospitable Nez-Percé, although they were warned that it was too early. Each man now had a horse to ride and a second carrying pack, and there were several extra animals. All were cheerful once more, for home seemed a surety. However, in seven days they found themselves in the midst of snow fields twelve to fifteen feet deep, with no forage for days ahead. With no guide, it seemed madness to proceed, and the captains ordered a retreat to the last pasturage. The sentiments of the party were voiced by Lewis when he wrote, "I am pleased at finding the river rise so rapidly; it no doubt is attributeable to the melting snows of the mountains; that icy barrier which separates me from my friends and country, from all which makes life estimable—patience, patience."

Having persuaded five Indians to serve as guides, they began on June 24 their second attempt to cross the mountains. The natives were intelligent and explained to reach each night a spot of budding grass for the horses. The trip was comparatively easy after the strained efforts of the year before in the same place. Now the hard crusted snow formed a smooth passageway over the rough rocks that had so sorely tried man and beast, and now, too, a sufficient quantity of roots and bear-oil seemed doubly luxurious in the memory of the few fish and dried berries that alone had warded off starvation.

DIVISION OF THE PARTY.

On July 3, the company reached the mouth of Traveler's Rest Creek, where it divided. Lewis and nine men planned to take the most direct route to the falls of the Missouri and then to explore the Maria's River, while Clark with the others was to go to the head of the Jefferson, from which a party would be sent over to the Yellowstone.

LEWIS'S TRIP UP THE MARIA.

On July 7, Lewis found and passed through what is now known as Lewis and Clark's Pass. On the same day, he struck the headwaters of the Sun, or Medicine River, and six days later reached their former camp above the falls. When they opened the cache made July 10, 1805, they found that the flood had destroyed everything but a chart of the Missouri and a few articles packed safely in boxes. Here, Sergeant Gass and five men were left to make trucks and to help the main party with the portage of the falls.

Lewis, Drewyer and the Fields brothers rode across country to the Maria to learn if any branch of it reached as far north as 50 deg. They ascended the stream until they proved that its sources came from the southwest, and then they turned back along the river's bank. On this return occurred the only shedding of human blood on the expedition.

On July 26, they met a party of eight Indians on horseback and camped with them overnight. At dawn, they were awakened by the natives stealing away with their guns and horses. Reuben Fields overtook the one with his gun, and stabbed him to the heart. Lewis pursued the man stealing his weapon and, with his pistol, shot him in the abdomen. The wounded man fell, shot at Lewis, then crawled behind a rock and made his escape. Lewis had no more ammunition and had to return to camp. The men chased the Indians until they secured four horses in lieu of the one that had been driven away. Lewis, at once gave orders to hurry back to their main party for he feared the tidings of the encounter would bring the whole tribe on a mission of vengence. They rode all day and by the light of the moon, until two o'clock the following morning, when they reached the Missouri and found most of their party waiting them. This incident, while it had no further effect on the expedition, left far-reaching consequences. The Blackfeet, for this was the tribe of the slain warrior, has always met the white men in a spirit of hostility and treachery. No amount of time has been able to erase the first impression of enmity.

The men Lewis had left above the falls were joined on July 19 by Sergeant Ordway and nine men who had come from Captain Clark's party down the Missouri in canoes. They were busy with the portage of the falls until July 27, when they floated down the river in time to meet Lewis. The party continued their descent of the Missouri without incident until August 11, when Lewis was accidently shot in the hip by one of the most faithful men in the party. The following day they met two Illinois traders who were going up the river and who had passed Clark lower down. As these were the first white men, outside their own party, that they had seen for sixteen months, the meeting was fraught with pleasure. On the same afternoon, they reached Captain Clark and his retinue.

WANT TARIFF REDUCED.

Irish Manufacturers May Ignore the World's Fair Unless United States Makes Concessions.

[STAFF CORRESPONDENCE OF THE TIMES.]

DUBLIN, Feb. 10.—Irish manufacturers are anxious to have some reductions made in the duty which the United States now impose on their products, and unless something can be done in this direction, the Emerald Isle's exhibit at St. Louis seems likely to be decidedly slim. The manufacturers contend that the present tariff precludes the possibility of their reaping any advantage from the exhibition of their goods in the United States. Capt. Shaw-Taylor, who has done so much toward settling the land question, Lord Iveagh, W. H. Pirrie and others are collecting material which may assist them in placing the case of Ireland before President Roosevelt in the hope that the tariff on Irish manufactured goods may be reduced, thus enabling Ireland to cultivate a trade with America.

They are basing their hopes of success on the fact that when Congress discovered, after the passing of the Tariff Act in 1897, that the duty on dried and cured fish was practically prohibitive and would destroy the fishing industry in the west of Ireland, whose principal market was New York, it was cut down to half a cent per pound, and the industry was saved from practical extinction.

It will be also pointed out that the United States gives preferential tariffs to Cuba and Canada with regard to certain class of commodities. The promoters of the scheme have not approached the Irish Parliamentary party on the matter because they do not consider it a subject that ought to be treated politically. After they have made thorough investigation into the class of goods that would find a favorable market in the United States at reduced tariff rates the cooperation of several leading men in the party will be invited so that an authorative presentation may be made to the President of the United States of a reasonable proposal for the favorable treatment of sundry Irish products.

On Good Authority.

No man in Congress has a more copious vocabulary than Representative William Sulzer, who recently spoke of a landscape seen in Cuba as an "indescribable mental melody."

They were discussing Sulzer in the Democratic cloakroom. "He certainly has the gift of language," said a member.

"Language!" remarked Representative "Tim" Sullivan of New York. "Why, I have it on good authority that he wrote the libretto for Webster's dictionary."—[Philadelphia Post.

CHAPTER V.

IN QUEST OF JIMINEZ.

Next morning by 10 o'clock Conover was at the Jiminez Hotel, as it was still generally called by the townspeople, although a brand-new signboard inscribed with the word "Albion" proclaimed the change of proprietorship. The young lawyer's manner, always carefully restrained, was even more quiet and reserved than usual. But he greeted his cousin with perfect cordiality.

"Let us take things in order, Charlie," he said, as they seated themselves in a corner of the smoking-room. "First of all, we'll have your story."

Basendale took a few reflective pulls at his cigar, and then began:

"Well, my story won't take long. You know all about that mining fiasco, but you would hardly believe how terribly cut up I was over the sorry business. In one billet after another I was proving no good; failure seemed to be dogging my footsteps at every turn. Then the old man—poor uncle, I'm afraid I gave him many a heartache—came it rather rough, and I felt I had just the choice of two alternatives, either to blow out my brains, or make a fresh start in some country where I was not known. Well, I chose the latter course; I had a flicker of hope left that I would yet redeem myself in uncle's eyes. Of course my mind turned naturally to the South African War, but I thought I should have a better chance in one of the irregular colonial corps than among the volunteers being sent out from home. I was bent on getting into Rimington's Scouts, about whom I had read a great deal; besides one of the officers had been an old chum of mine in New South Wales. However, I was in a difficulty."

"The usual one, eh?—lack of funds?"

"Well, I had parted with all my little money to help in the settlement of those stock exchange liabilities, and had barely a ten-pound note left. But some time before I had lent a fellow in the city £50, so I hunted him up, and he promised faithfully to pay me back the money in a month at latest. I was too sick of London to remain there a day longer than was necessary; and then I had the chance of a passage here to Santa Cruz for a fiver in the same old tramp on which I had worked my way back from Australia three years ago. So I came along this first stage of my journey to the Cape, and the money was to be sent after me. But that promise was broken, Walter; the cash never came. I was in a deuce of a fix; I couldn't settle my bill with Jiminez, the Spaniard who used to run this hotel. Even my kit wasn't worth selling; for, as I was going on a campaign, I had left spare clothes, dressing-case, and everything else of value behind."

Conover smiled. "What a happy-go-lucky fellow you have always been," he commented softly.

"Well, once a man gets down on his luck," responded Basendale, "every mortal thing seems to go wrong. Soon I was fairly on my uppers here, waiting on and on, and just hoping against hope that the remittance would come. One day I chanced to go on board a passing South African liner outward bound. There were a lot of Yeomanry fellows in the second saloon, and among them was Ned Irons, the Surrey amateur, with whom I had played in many a cricket match in the old days. Well, when Ned heard a bit of my yarn, he insisted on my coming along and on his paying my fare to Cape Town. Even had I wished, there was no time left for me to return to the hotel here to settle my score, for when the proposal was put to me the steamer's warning bell had already rung. There was only one thing to do—the chance was too good to miss, and Señor Jiminez's bill could wait. So I let my kit-bag and few belongings slide, and took the vacant berth in Ned's cabin. Poor chap, he was mortally wounded at Klipfontein, a fortnight after we landed at Table Bay."

Basendale paused; his voice had broken, and there was just the glisten of moisture in his eyes.

"You didn't write to Jiminez and get your traps sent on?" asked Conover.

"No," replied Basendale, steadying himself and relighting his cigar. "I had no use for them, nor had I the ready cash just then to settle; and as for writing to explain—well, I had really other things to think about. Besides Jiminez here had got my name wrong. An ass of a Spanish clerk had entered me in the hotel book as C. B. Dale—of course, I had given him C. Basendale, but that was how he chose to clip the name up. So Dale I had been called, and had never bothered to correct the mistake. But I'm hanged if I could bring myself to write a letter in a false name; therefore, the simplest thing to do was to let the bill rest, and pick up my bag on the way home. As a matter of fact, yesterday morning first thing on landing, I came along to the hotel with the intention of discharging the debt. But Jiminez has sold out and gone, and the new proprietor, an Englishman, appears to have neither record of my bill nor trace of the luggage I had left."

"Your kit-bag was sent to Lennox Gardens in August last year," remarked Conover, watching the other attentively while he spoke.

"The devil it was!" exclaimed Basendale in profound surprise.

"You see, uncle's address was on the papers inside. It was the natural thing for the bag to be forwarded to him."

"Then did Jiminez apply to uncle for the money I owed?" asked Basendale uneasily. "The sleek old scoundrel! I shall feel inclined to break every bone in his body if he has played me a low-down trick of that kind."

"No, your bag was sent home sealed, and with the intimation from the British vice-consul at Santa Cruz that you had died here in this hotel on the 13th of August last."

For a moment Basendale remained speechless, blank amazement written on his countenance.

"Died on the 13th of August!" he at last managed to articulate. "Great Scott! I was up at Pretoria by then. What the blazes does it all mean?"

"You may well look surprised," There is some extraordinary mystery, about the whole affair, and in a way it is really in connection with this that I have come out to Santa Cruz."

"You did not believe in my death then?"

"Oh, yes, we all believed in it," replied Conover promptly and emphatically. "How could we doubt it? Never once, my dear fellow, have I dreamed that you were alive, until I ran up against you yesterday on the quay. I tell you, the shock was just as if I had met a ghost."

"I thought uncle would have seen my name in dispatches," said Basendale, just touching the narrow band of ribbon on his breast above the disabled arm in its sling.

Uncle was very ill for weeks before he died, and I was too worried and too busy to go wading through the daily columns of names in connection with the war. Of course, had we ever imagined that you were there, it would have been different. But with the certificate of your death in our hands, such a thought never once occurred."

"So Uncle James died without knowing I had won my cross," said Basendale, slowly and regretfully.

"You were foolish never to have written home, Charlie. But upon my soul you seem to be the most unlucky dog in the world. You go blundering out of one hole into another."

"Yes," he assented, humbly. "I am truly sorry uncle did not know I had brought just one touch of credit to the old name."

"Well, regrets are useless now. As I say, we counted you as dead."

"Then where lies the mystery that brought you here?"

"That concerns the ladies with whom you saw me yesterday. They are clients of mine—a Mrs. da Silva and her daughter. A certain individual disappeared here in Teneriffe just about the very time you were reported to have died. He was a thief, who had in his possession papers of family importance to Mrs. da Silva. We have come out to try and recover these. And it has struck me since yesterday, Charlie, my boy, when I so unexpectedly encountered you alive and in the flesh, that your alleged death has been made the means of covering up this identical fraud."

Basendale looked perplexed.

"What are you driving at?" he demanded in a tone of bewilderment.

"Well, for the moment I am just as puzzled as you can be," replied Conover. "But we must worry things out together. We must discover who it was who died in this hotel on August 13th last, with your kit-bag in his possession, and papers belonging to you, even your card-case, in his pockets."

"How in all the world could that have happened?"

"It did happen—there's the point," returned the lawyer, decisively. As he spoke he produced a packet of documents tied with red tape, and selected a particular one, drawing it partially out and touching the docket on its back." Here's the Consul's letter setting forth the facts, announcing the dispatch of the bag, enclosing the certificate of your death, and remitting the balance of your money after hotel bill and funeral expenses had been paid."

Basendale burst into a loud laugh.

"But I had no money here in Teneriffe," he cried; "my hotel bill is unpaid to this day; and, although, I've had a few close calls, thank the Lord, old chap, there has been no funeral yet in my case. The Consul's letter, it strikes me, is a tissue of downright nonsense."

"Then I think we couldn't do better than call upon the gentleman in question, and ask for an explanation," suggested Conover, rising to his feet.

"Right you are," assented Basendale, as he picked up his hat and threw away the stump of his cigar.

The representative of Great Britain was in his office on the Marina. He received his visitors courteously, and listened with patient attention to the story of mistaken, or rather assumed, identity. At the close of the narrative he explained that he himself had been absent on the adjacent island of Grand Canary during the very week of Charles Basendale's supposed death, and that the duties connected with the identification and interment of the man who had undoubtedly died in the Jiminez Hotel had been performed by his chief clerk.

This assistant, a Spaniard who spoke English fluently, was sent for, and told all he knew in a perfectly straightforward manner. He had been called to see the deceased on the night of his death, he had taken a doctor with him, and both of them were present when the papers had been removed from the dead man's body and examination made of those in the bag lying on a chair by his side. The traveller had entered his name on the hotel register as Charles Basendale, and the identification had been so certain and complete that no doubt whatever had been raised in any one's mind. The autopsy made early on the morning following the demise was also clear and unmistakable, revealing enlargement and serious valvular disease of the heart, as the medical certificate showed. On the suggestion of Señor Jiminez, and with the cordial concurrence of the doctor, the clothes in which the man had actually died were burned, simply as a measure of precaution, because small-pox was prevalent in many parts of the world, and it was uncertain with whom the deceased might have been in contact. The consular representative had taken possession of the other effects, and in ordinary routine had discharged all due liabilities out of the money found on the dead man's person, the balance remaining being transmitted to his relatives, and the bag with its contents, properly sealed, being sent home at the same time.

Asked to describe the personal appearance of the individual who had been buried in the name of Charles Basendale, the clerk's memory was not too precise. He could say, however, that the deceased bore little resemblance certainly to the real Mr. Basendale now in the room. He was of slighter build and probably also of shorter stature, his moustache was fairer, and he appeared to be at least several years older. But that was about all the witness could say after this lapse of time.

It was clear both to the Consul and to his visitors that the only person who could throw light on the mystery was the hotel-keeper, Jiminez. But the Spaniard had sold his business and departed from the island three or four months before, and no one in the office appeared to have heard where exactly he had gone. The Consul promised, however, that exhaustive inquiries would be made, and the result communicated as soon as possible to Basendale and Conover. He took their addresses, and the interview terminated without the lawyer having found it necessary to make any mention of the real object of the quest, namely, the missing will.

"By the way, Charlie," said Conover, when the cousins had gained the street, "Mrs. da Silva has been asking me about you. That bit of metal on your breast caught her eye, and she wishes to make your acquaintance. Will you come up to Andalusia this afternoon? Tea is at 4 o'clock. But perhaps you don't care to bother with such passing friendships. They are rather commonplace people, too, not in the least likely to interest you."

He had delivered the message in a tone of halting reluctance, and now he glanced furtively at Basendale to note the effect of the closing sentence with which he had strives to discount the invitation. The soldier, however, showed no hesitation in accepting.

"I'll be delighted to come," he said. "But I've got no other clothes except my uniform."

"Well, your uniform seems to answer very well," replied Conover with just the suspicion of a sneer; "with the women-folk, at all events," he added, sotto voce and bitterly.

But the aside and the jibing look were alike unnoticed by Basendale.

"And, meanwhile, Walter," went on the latter heartily, "I'll have a fossick around the hotel, and see whether any of the waiters remember the poor devil who died."

Conover's face darkened; that Basendale should mix himself up with the Da Silva's affairs was the last thing he desired or intended.

"I don't see that you are called on to do anything on your own responsibility in regard to that man," he said coldly. "Of course what I told you about my clients' business was in strict confidence. It requires no outside interference, thank you."

"Oh, come now," laughed Basendale. "When a fellow takes the liberty of pegging out in my name, I've a right to know the reason why, haven't I? Besides, I have got to find our friend Jiminez to settle my hotel score with him."

"No doubt," assented Conover with a grim smile. "Perhaps you have a bigger score to settle with the Spaniard than you bargain for."

"What do you mean?" asked Basendale in quick surprise.

But Conover was not to be drawn just yet.

"We shall see you at tea time," he said lightly. "Take the electric tram as far as the Bull Ring. The Pension de Andalusia is only a few minutes' walk from there. So long."

He stopped a victoria that chanced to be crawling by, jumped in, and left Basendale on the pavement, puzzled and pondering.

CHAPTER VI.

"THAT SORRY JADE, FORTUNE,"

Walter Conover was both surprised and chagrined to find that at the luncheon table of the Pension de Andalusia the engrossing subject of conversation was nothing less than his cousin, Charles Basendale, and the gallant feat of arms that had won for him the cross "For Valor." The topic had been introduced at breakfast-time by Mrs. da Silva. She had commented on the circumstance that Conover's friend of the day before, whom they had seen on the mole, was wearing on his breast the coveted distinction. This had naturally led to the soldier's name being given and the relationship explained; in fact, Conover had basked complacently in the reflected sunshine of his cousin's fame, and in this mood he had cheerfully undertaken to transmit the invitation for the afternoon.

During the morning the hostess, herself an English lady and the widow of a British officer, had gone over her stock of illustrated newspapers, and had found a back-number which contained a full-page picture and a detailed account of Trooper Basendale's act of heroism. It was a brave story—a story to make the blood tingle and the heart throb proudly in the bosom of sympathetic womankind. A lieutenant of Basendale's squadron had fallen, but the trooper had turned and ridden back across a strip of veldt that was a perfect hell of whizzing bullets and bursting shells. His horse had dropped under him, but he had continued the rush to the side of his wounded leader on foot. The officer was a mere lad, and Basendale, a man of powerful build, had swung him over his shoulder. A moment later his left arm was shattered by a bullet, but he had reeled across the plain of death still bearing his burden. To the straining of eyes of the spectators the rescuer seemed to bear a charmed life; the ground in front and behind was being plowed by lead, but onward he came amidst breathless suspense that hushed the very cheer quivering in the throats of his watching comrades. At last Basendale tottered and fell; he had been wounded a second time in the thigh. But by this time he was on the outer edge of the fire-swept zone, and a dozen men dashed out to bring the hero back to his lines. Amidst a yell of joy that for a moment silenced even the crash of the guns, Basendale and Lord Fochabers, the lad he had saved, were borne into safety, and placed side by side in the same ambulance. "Look to Trooper Basendale, first, doctor," gasped the young lieutenant just before he swooned away from loss of blood. "By the god of battles, he is a brave man!" And so said all who had witnessed the thrilling episode. The illustrator had caught the spirit of the gallant deed; amid a cloud of flying grit and gravel the hero was seen staggering onward with his helpless burden toward his expectant comrades.

Among the ladies at Andalusia the picture had been passed from hand to hand; but the eyes that flashed brightest as they studied it were those of Doreen da Silva. "Was she to see and converse with the man who had done that glorious deed?" was her unspoken question.

So Conover, when he took his place at luncheon, had been greeted with a chorus of eager inquiries as to whether Mr. Basendale were coming that afternoon. Within a minute the buzz of conversation at the long table told him that his cousin was likely to fall among a company of hero-worshipers. As the meal proceeded the sense of his own paltry insignicance oppressed him. Doreen especially kept plying him with questions, all bearing on the relative of whom, no doubt, he should have been so proud. But he returned only the curtest of answers. His soul was indeed sore within him; the demon of jealousy possessed him; and he was cursing his stupidity in having suggested to Basendale the breaking of his journey.

On the terrace after luncheon Conover took a chair beside Mrs. da Silva and Doreen, and gave them a full account of the visit to the office of the British Vice-Consul. The coincidence that wove the name of Charles Basendale into their own story came to the ladies as a supreme surprise. The facts could not be concealed by Conover, although he did everything in his power to minimize their importance, and, indeed, to twist them to his cousin's detriment.

"It was just like the reckless improvident fellow," he remarked contemptuously, "to be in an hotel without having the money to settle his bill. That's Basendale, all over. His life has been one series of escapades, foolish or worse, as you choose to consider them. As a youth he came back like a bad penny from Australia, working his passage on an ocean tramp. Later on he lost two excellent positions in London, and finally he was mixed up in a mining scandal that broke the heart of our uncle, his protector and only relative besides myself. Leaving England in disgrace, he was apparently masquerading here in Teneriffe under a false name and without a shilling in his pocket. I don't profess to know the whole story, Mrs. da Silva, and disclaim all responsibility for Basendale. I am only sorry that he should be connected, even remotely, with any family affairs of yours."

Mrs. da Silva listened to this ill-humored tirade in quiet astonishment.

"I shall like to have the chance of judging Mr. Basendale for myself," she observed coldly.

But indignation was burning in Doreen's eyes.

"The man who did that deed in the Transvaal cannot answer to your description, Mr. Conover," she exclaimed, bravely and warmly.

The lawyer saw at once that he had made a false move; he had used the brutal iron-spiked club of abuse when, in the present mood of his listeners, even the delicate poignard of insinuation might have been dangerous of employment.

"Oh, please don't mistake me," he said with a sickly attempt at a smile. "Basendale is a good enough fellow, although rather wild and foolish as I have explained. But I am fond and proud of him, of course, and am thankful indeed that he has now found a career which is likely to suit him. Still," he added, reflectively, "except in war time the lot of an officer in the British army who has nothing but his pay to live on won't be either, the pleasantest or the safest one for him."

It was a dainty and malicious little stab this time. Doreen's generous advocacy of the absent and slandered man had stung Conover to the quick, and it was well that her mother should know from the first that the hero-soldier was a pauper as well as a scapegrace. Conover was content to retire temporarily from the field; on the plea that he had a letter to write, he left the terrace and withdrew to his own room.

"It strikes me that Mr. Conover has little love for his cousin," observed Mrs. da Silva, as she drew a piece of needlework from a bag on her lap.

"Do you know, mother dear," said Doreen, "I despise that man every day more and more. He is so full of petty meanness. I am sorry we have ever employed him."

"If he succeeds in this business that is all we need care," replied Mrs. da Silva with a little sigh of weariness. "I fear the task we have set him grows more difficult at every stage. But Mr. Conover, whatever his faults, is clever, clear-headed, and persevering. He may yet undo all this wicked work." My poor little Doreen! It is hard indeed that you should have to learn so young that the world contains so many villains."

The girl sat silent for a minute, a grave, far-away look on her pretty face. "Never mind, mother mine," she said at last, speaking soft and low and almost dreamily. "Money is not everything. If we establish my rights, be it so; but if we fail, well then let them go. And don't let us forget that if there are villains in the world, there are good men and brave men, too."

While speaking she had caught a glimpse of an upright, well-knit figure clad in khaki advancing up the long avenue shaded by orange trees.

"Here comes Mr. Basendale," she added, a slight blush of tell-tale expectancy rising to her brow.

"Yes, it is he," said Mrs. da Silva, following the direction of her daughter's glance; and nothing more was said until the young officer, courteously saluting the several little groups seated on the terrace, had passed under the portico.

Conover received his cousin upstairs in his private apartment. He had been considering the best line of action, and had decided that, before Basendale came under the spell of Doreen's eyes, it would be well that the swaggering military adventurer should realize his penniless condition.

The lawyer motioned his visitor to take a seat on the sofa, and, with a word of apology, proceeded to finish the letter over which he had apparently been busy when the other entered. After a few minutes of industrious penmanship he swung round on the desk chair, and came to his subject without any preliminary.

"By the way, Charlie, I have bad news for you. You have not yet asked about your uncle's affairs."

"No; I have been thinking of other things," answered Basendale quietly. "But what is the bad news, Walter?"

"You do not know the nature of your uncle's will?"

"I have heard nothing since I left England, of course. But he himself showed me his will—oh, let me see, it must have been two years ago, I suppose."

"But he made a new one after you ran away from London."

Basendale winced; a flush of resentment stole over his brow.

"There was no question of my running away," he said in a low voice. "I was my own master."

"Well, that is how uncle looked at it at all events," replied Conover lightly, and with a desperate effort to appear cool. "As I told you this morning you are an unlucky beggar, my boy. He cut you out there and then from his will."

The listener paled.

"Oh, come now," he stammered, "Uncle James wasn't so angry as all that, surely?"

"Your conduct fairly broke him down," said Conover, sternly now and with lips compressed in the pauses between his sentences. "He drew out his new will the week after you disappeared. I did all I could to prevent his signing it, and indeed I managed to delay the completion of the document almost until the very day of his death. But in the end he insisted; and of course it didn't matter then, for we all believed you to be dead."

Basendale rose to his feet; a strange light gleamed in his eyes.

"You are lying to me, Walter Conover, and you know it," he exclaimed, hoarsely and intensely. The men glared at each other; all the old hatred of schoolboy days, repressed during maturer years, flashed out again like a spark of fire amid dry grass. Conover in turn blanched; but he did not seek to interrupt.

"You lie, Walter, and I tell you so to your teeth. I knew our uncle well. He would never have drawn up that will, never have passed me over, had he known that I was alive. When he did actually sign it, no doubt he believed that I was dead. I'll accept that reason, and that reason only, for my disinheritance. But in these circumstances do you mean to stick to my share of the property, to treat the old will as waste paper—do you tell me that, Walter Conover?"

"My dear fellow," he replied, with a smile that was meant to be conciliatory, "I have told you the exact truth. I close my ears to the abominable word you have used, no doubt in the natural heat of the moment. But the facts are as I have stated. Uncle, long before we heard of your death, had decided that it was useless to entrust money to such a spendthrift—well, to such a knock-about fellow as you. I am awfully sorry Charlie, I can assure you."

"Do you deliberately intend to take all the money—my share as well as your own?" Basendale repeated his question, steadily regarding Conover while he did so. Over the lawyer's face came a cloud of abashed confusion.

"I have really no choice in the matter," he mumbled. "The possession of money is a sacred trust. I have a duty to perform in rightly using it."

"Bah!" exclaimed Basendale, as he turned away with unconcealed disgust, and commenced drumming a forefinger on the window pane.

An interval of strained silence followed; then a gong sounded faintly downstairs. Conover welcomed the interruption. He got up from his chair, and approached the casement.

"That's the gong for tea," he said, in a tone of conciliation. "But after what I've told you, old fellow, are you in a mood for meeting Mrs. da Silva?"

Basendale wheeled round abruptly; a stern set look was on his countenance.

"Yes, I wish to meet Mrs. da Silva. She and I have a task in common, my friend. I now understand your reference this morning to the real score that has to be settled between me and that scoundrel, Jiminez. He used my name, he announced my death, for some mean trick of his own. And by the living thunder he will have to pay for the wrong he has done me if there is no law in these islands that can reach him I'll wring his neck—with my own hands, if there is no law in these islands that can reach him I'll wring the devil's neck."

The fierce passion in his face raised and tightly-clenched fist, unwounded arm, showed Basendale's words were no idle threat. Involuntarily Conover shrank back a pace or two, looked ashamed before, but himself afraid now.

...Liszt's Resignation.

...It is seldom that the resignation of a professor creates the amount of ...gossip and talk which has followed ...the resignation of Edward Alexander MacDowell ...from Columbia University. He considers that the effects ...of this are reflected in the preparatory ...schools and women's colleges, who like...wise neglect art, and he states that ...in the higher education in these institutions becomes incomplete, and ...materialism chokes out idealism." ...Mr. MacDowell presents the argument that the college should demand a ...high degree of acquaintance with the ...arts before the student is eligible ...for admission. He says: "The present ...custom of the incoming student demands a remedy, if the courses in the ...arts are to give anything but the ...most elementary instruction." He ...offers a plausible suggestion, that music be taken out of the Faculty of ...Philosophy, and architecture out of ...the School of Mines, and with belles ...lettres form a Faculty of Fine Arts, to ...which painting and sculpture would be indispensable. Mr. McDowell also states that in the manner in which the studies are arranged at the present time a division of fine arts acquires somewhat the nature of a coeducational department store, and tends toward materialism rather than toward idealism.

From the very first line Mr. McDowell shows that, whereas he may have made a correct estimate of the conditions, he is very far from making the slightest suggestion as to the remedy. We must accept the university to develop the intellectual side of our students, and it is generally understood that there must be a certain amount of education before a student may enter any great institution. The university has never been regarded as a creative force, but more as a developing one. For this reason it is not easy to see why Mr. MacDowell should expect the college or university to create an art atmosphere in this country, as the college does not create the education of the country. That must be, and is, well done by the public schools of America.

Art in a nation is inculcated through its children, and if not in the home, where but in the public schools can they possibly acquire a taste for it? If education had been left to the home where would this country stand today? And there is not the slightest difference between acquiring what we consider a common school education and an art—they always begin from the same starting place and each branch of study becomes an art or a science as it is carried into a high state of development. What Mr. MacDowell is trying to accomplish is to put music on its correct basis in the universities, but this neither Mr. MacDowell nor anyone else can accomplish until music has been put on the correct basis in our public schools, for here is the beginning, and the end, if it must be—whereas the college represents only the end and the beginning in nothing. A taste for art is developed in the cradle and should follow a child's daily life during his school years, and by the time he is ready for college he will either have shown such talent that an artistic career will be selected instead of the college course, or he will have gained enough knowledge of art and its effects upon his emotional nature to enable him to fully appreciate the refinements of idealism, but not to the extent of drawing him away from a career for which he is better fitted than that of an artist or musician. It behooves every country to create an army of music lovers, but they need not of necessity be music producers, and whether we speak of music or any other art the result should be the same.

Mr. MacDowell has uttered an incontrovertible truth when he says that materialism chokes out idealism, but the way in which he uses these two words conveys the idea to him anything that does not relate to art is material. Now, a good deal that is not idealism is intellectuality, and this is as necessary a factor in the development of an art as idealism itself, but has nothing to do with materialism, which no one need be told is detrimental to any psychic or spiritual development.

While people are talking from the elevated plane of the ideal as to ways and means of improving the musical conditions in the country, the colleges, and in the home, they persistently close their ears to all suggestions as to the only possible remedy, and, if into every university in the country a MacDowell and a Parker and a Paine might be installed, the influence would not amount to as much as a drop in the bucket of what it should be, so long as the public school music is treated as it is at present. Perish the thought that a little sight-reading, toe singing of a few school songs and a cursory glance at the fundamentals of music can be of any benefit whatever! Take MacDowell out of Columbia and Parker out of Yale and Paine out of Harvard, and to this add Foote and Huss and a few others who might be mentioned, and leave the music in the public schools to them, and, if they could not outline and execute a plan which would revolutionize conditions in this country inside of five years, it would be time to give up the matter as hopeless.—[Musical Leader.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

George Ade is to write the book and John Philip Sousa the music for a new musical comedy in which De Wolf Hopper will be seen next summer.

Peter Hartman has dedicated his new oratorio, "The Last Supper," to Emperor William. The Emperor has accepted the dedication.

Mlle. Dartoy, an American singer, who had brought an action for damages against a Paris cab company for injuries sustained in a collision between a carriage and her automobile, has just been awarded 4131 francs and 67 centimes.

The concerts of the Rome Cecilian Academy began this month. It was announced that Colonne, of Paris, would direct two orchestral concerts. The pianist Diemer, the violinist Hubermann and Moris Rosenthal are promised. Mascagni will conduct an orchestral concert, and Mancinelli a concert, with orchestra and chorus.

Decorations and distinctions are rampant in musical Germany this year. Heinrich Grünfeld, the 'cellist, has been weighted down with the title of "Königlicher und Kaiserlicher Professor," and the Academy of Fine Arts has admitted within its exclusive portals Eugen d'Albert and Wilhelm Berger, the latter an American composer until recently resident in Berlin.

Operatic agents in Italy will be sorely wounded, both in spirits and in pocket, according to the latest news from Rome. It seems that an operatic trust has been formed with a capital of 1,000,000 lire. The object of the trust is to take under management all the principal theaters of Italy.

The Paris Figaro gave on January 25 one of its famous "Five o'Clocks," at which a crowd of its subscribers attended. Mme. Emma Nevada sang the air from "Traviata," with flute accompaniment by M. Gaubert, and the Mad Scene from "Lucia" with a virtuosity which made the audience think for the time that Verdi was young and Donizetti new.

While in Cincinnati on Lincoln's birthday, Madame Schumann-Heink announced the engagement of her daughter, Charlotte, to Dr. George Rief, a physician of Dresden. As Madame Schumann-Heink expects to remain in the United States this summer, it is reported that the wedding may be celebrated in New York in the early autumn. All of the children of the famous contralto are coming here to spend the summer with their mother.

Reports from Dresden tell of an interesting discovery by Prof. Rich. Buchmayer in the Library of Luneburg. It is of a number of works of one of Bach's predecessors, Matthias Weckmann, organist of St. James' Church, Hamburg, in which town he aided in founding the Collegium Musicum. The works are said to be in the style of Bach. Weckmann was born in 1621, settled in Hamburg 1663, and died there in 1674.

The details now are settled of the sixteenth biennial Cincinnati Music Festival, to be held May 11, 12, 13 and 14, 1904. Theodore Thomas will direct the five concerts. The principal works to be produced are Bach's B minor Mass, Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" and ninth Symphony; and "The Dream of Gerontius," by Edgar. The soloists so far engaged are Mmes. Schumann-Heink, Muriel Foster and Agnes Nicholls, and William Green and Watkin Mills.

It has been supposed that the Russian national hymn was composed by Gen. A. S. Low, in 1833. It is now asserted that he merely made use of an old melody. In a collection of marches there is a printed score of "March 94," from a "Collection of Royal Prussian Army Marches." It is entitled "Quick March from St. Petersburg of the Regiment Preobraschenski," composed by Haas. The march was printed between 1830 and 1832, and the trio is perfectly identical with the motif of the national hymn. Ferdinand Rogdanowitsch Haas, born 1787, died 1851, was capellmeister of the St. Petersburg Guard Regiment.

Another musical legend has been annihilated. The story has been told innumerable times how Liszt once received at Weimar, a visit from Brahms, who fell asleep while Liszt played him his B minor sonata, whereat Liszt was so angry that he left the room. There is not a word of truth in this tale, according to Max Kalbeck, who has just brought out the first volume (499 pages, extending to the year 1863) of the first authoritative Brahms biography. Nor is it true that Liszt and Joachim were so much pleased with the compositions of the young Brahms that they recommended him to Schumann. It appears that when Brahms first sent specimens of his work, Schumann returned them with the remark that he had no time to look them over. When he subsequently, after a long silence, wrote an article in which he announced Brahms as the new musical "Messiah," Hans von Bulow wrote: "It is just fifteen years since Schumann spoke in the same way about Sterndale Bennett." Kalbeck's book is extremely conservative. He regards the sonata as the culmination of all possible development of musical form, regardless of the fact that Brahms himself wrote sonatas for the pianoforte only early in his career, and thereafter preferred the shorter forms of the romantic school.

A Theater Party.

She—Say, dear, will you take me to the theater with you tonight?

He—why, I don't know. (I'll put up a bluff about its being too late to get tickets.) Have you got the tickets, dear?

She—no, not yet. Is it too late?

He—I'm afraid it is. (Here's where I make good. It will be just the same as if I took her.) I happen to know there isn't a seat left.

She—Have you been inquiring?

He—(Gee whiz, she suspects me of going off myself. Foxy.) Certainly not, darling. I heard Smith say so this afternoon. He tried all over town to get seats. (Here's where I get in my fine work) What in the world did you suggest such a thing for?

She—Why? Would you go if you could.

He—would I go? (What a chance she has given me.) Why, sweetheart, I'm dying to go. What did you mention the theater for, anyway? I hadn't thought about it until you spoke. Hang the luck. I feel just like having a good time—with you. (That'll make her feel good.) Wouldn't it be nice? A good play, all by ourselves, and then—

She (breathlessly)—What then?

He—(Oh, this is easy.) Oh, then we'd have a nice little supper. Oh, why did you mention it. It makes me sick. Now we'll have to stay home and mope. I feel just in the mood. Oh, if we only had a couple of seats.

She (clapping her hands)—You dear. We have. We have.

He—(Heavens, am I caught?) What do you mean?

She—I mean this. This morning early I reserved two fine ones over the telephone. Come dear, there isn't a moment to lose.—[Smart Set.

Dod, Man, America's Too Big.

James Ritchie, a Scotchman, who has spent nearly all his thirty years of life on his father's farm, nine miles from Glasgow, got his first glimpse of a great city on Friday afternoon as he came up the bay aboard the Allan-State Line steamship Corinthian, fra' Glesca. He was dazzled by the monumental proportions of things and went to the Star Hotel in Clarkson street in an intellectual maze. He had a prepaid ticket to Winnipeg, Manitoba, and money and instructions from his thrifty father to buy a farm there. When he learned that Winnipeg wasn't on any trolley line near New York, but several days away by train, he decided that he wouldn't make the journey.

The bigness of New York and the bigness of the continental suburbs appalled the young farmer. He told the hotel clerk that it was "no use;" he could never get accustomed to things in a country so much larger than Scotland.

"I'll ne'er make oot," he said, "I'm fer hame—east or west, hame is best."

On Saturday morning Ritchie got a berth aboard the Anchor liner Ethiopia, which sailed at noon for Glasgow, and he will resume work on his father's farm.—[New York Sun.

Such a Dazzling Princess.

Princess Schahowskoi-Strechneff, the Russian noblewoman, who owns the most sumptuous saloon railway car in Europe, has just arrived at Nice with an enormous suite of Circassian attendants, secretaries and servants, who all wear the most richly elaborate national Circassian costumes.

The saloon car of the Princess is a marvel of engineering skill. It possesses nine different systems of safety brakes, is heated by electricity, and owing to a wonderful arrangement of the wheels and axles can be adjusted in a few moments to run on any gauge of rails in Europe or Asia.

The Princess, who has dazzled this city with the magnificence of her equipages and suites, will embark at Villefranche this week on the magnificent steam yacht Velleda, which has been fitted out with the most costly luxury imaginable for a long cruise in the Mediterranean.—[Philadelphia North American.

Cardinal Gibbons' Omen.

While Cardinal Gibbons, then a monsignor, was living in Rome a few years ago, he went to dine at the American college. Dinner over, some bonbonnieres representing hats of every description were passed around as souvenirs. The waiter carrying the tray on which they were stumbled just as he reached Mgr. Gibbons, and a miniature cardinal's hat, the red tricorn, rolled from the tray into the prelate's plate.

Count Cassell, who was a warm friend of the monsignor, saw the episode, and leaning across the table quoted the old maxim:

"Coming events cast their shadows before."

Everybody laughed, and so did the monsignor, but a year later, when the dignity of cardinal was conferred upon him, several recalled that dinner at the American college.—[New York Times.

Made Himself Clear.

A Kentucky distiller tells this story at the expense of Justice Harlan of the United States Supreme Court:

They were fellow-guests at a reception in Washington, and the hostess rallied the justice on his failure to drink more than one glass of punch. He replied that as a Kentuckian he felt disloyal to drink his other than straight, adding that just then he was out of the genuine tipple in his home.

The distiller that evening telegraphed to his manager, who sent the justice a case of his best. Next Sunday the two men met in the church of which Mr. Harlan is a deacon. The distiller was coming down the steps, when the justice called to him:

"That was splendid."

Then, remembering where he was, he added hastily:

"The sermon, I mean, of course."—[New York Times.

Blame the Reporter.

Sir Frederick W. Borden is scarcely gracious or graphic in his definitions of what he calls the different types of newspaper reporters. The reporter who dares to attempt to improve upon the words of a public speaker is a Smart Aleck in Sir Frederick's explanatory dictionary. By contrast, this observation recalls a remark we once heard Wendell Phillips make to the late Mr. Yerrington, the pioneer of shorthand reporting in Boston. Said the matchless orator:

"Mr. Yerrington, I want to thank you for the excellent report you made of my speech in Faneuil Hall the other night. I know I made several slips, but I notice that you corrected them in translating your shorthand notes. I have noted this on several occasions when you have reported my off-hand utterances, and I am grateful to you for reporting better speeches than I sometimes make."—[Boston Herald.

Cars Blocked by Ice Wagon.

"This is a joke," exclaimed a big man, muffled in a heavy ulster, when he emerged from one of a long line of cable trains which were blocked near State and Van Buren streets shortly after 5 o'clock yesterday afternoon and discovered the delay had been caused by a collision between a grip car and an ice wagon.

"This might be all right to get tied up like this in July or August, but if any one can explain what on earth an ice wagon is doing out here on the streets on the coldest day in thirty years I'll buy the refreshments."

In the meantime others had joined the joker, and their anger at being delayed was dispelled when they learned what had happened. The collision was due to slippery rails. Andrew Carson was driving a wagon belonging to the Knickerbocker Ice Company across State street, when the cable train approached. The gripman was unable to stop the train and it crashed into the wagon. Carson was thrown from his seat, but escaped injury. Several policemen from the Harrison-street and central stations assisted in clearing away the wreckage, and traffic was resumed after a delay of less than half an hour.—[Chicago Chronicle.

Australian Mine 3000 Feet Deep.

What is believed to be the deepest gold mine in the world is being worked at Bendigo, Australia. The mine in question, which is called the New Chum Railway mine, has sunk its main shaft to a depth of 3000 feet, or only a little short of three-quarters of a mile. The chief problem is how to keep the tunnels and general workings cool enough for the miners to work in at such a depth. It is usually about 108 deg., and, to enable the men to work at all, a spray of cold water let down from above has to be kept continually playing on the bodies—naked from the waist upward—of the miners. Even then they cannot work hard, or they would faint from exhaustion.

Only Good to Look at.

"I never carried a revolver and never had occasion to use one during the twenty years I was on the road before going into business for myself," said a Malden Lane jeweler. "I've often been timorous when passing through sections of the country where robbers are likely to hold up trains, but the worst fright I ever had was in Illinois the last year I acted as a salesman. In hurrying to catch a train at a town known as Egypt I placed a box of diamonds valued at $3000 in my overcoat pocket and forgot all about it until I reached the hotel at my next stopping place. The jewels were gone and I felt worse than any man who has lost his all through speculation.

"I recalled taking off my overcoat and sitting in the same seat with a farmer. I have a habit of drawing such people out, more for my own entertainment than anything else, and I remembered his telling me where he lived, but he might have been fooling me.

"I telegraphed the house that I was ill, for I was, and then went in search of the old farmer. I was surprised to find him, and still more surprised to have him hand the book of diamonds to me as soon as I had been made comfortable.

"'Didn't ever calculate to see you ag'in,' he said, heartily, 'but I reckon you was takin' them there shiny stones home for the children to play with. I found 'em on the car floor after you got out and was goin' to keep 'em a few weeks and then 'stribute 'em 'round 'mong the neighbors' children. They are purty, but they ain't no use but to look at.'

"When I slipped a $20 bill into his hand on parting he looked as though he thought I was crazy.—[New York Press.

The Solence of a Light.

Cheap commercial acetylene gas was discovered by accident. William, a scientific experimenter, believed that nearly all metallic oxides could be reduced to a metallic state by heating them to an extremely high temperature by the voltic arc in the presence of free carbon. Aluminum had been successfully reduced in this way. Mr. Willson wished to obtain metallic calcium. He therefore mixed a quantity of quicklime with pulverized coke and brought the mixture to a high temperature by the action of the voltaic arc. He expected to obtain a white metal, but instead he appeared to produce nothing but slag. This was thrown into the yard and one day at noon while the boys were having their luncheon they picked up these bits of slag and threw them at each other. One piece fell into a pail of water and produced a bubbling effect and a strong odor. This attracted Mr. Willson's attention, and upon investigation he found that the strong-smelling gas was extremely inflammable. Further investigation revealed that it was pure acetylene gas.—[Sir Hiram Maxim, in Harper's Weekly.

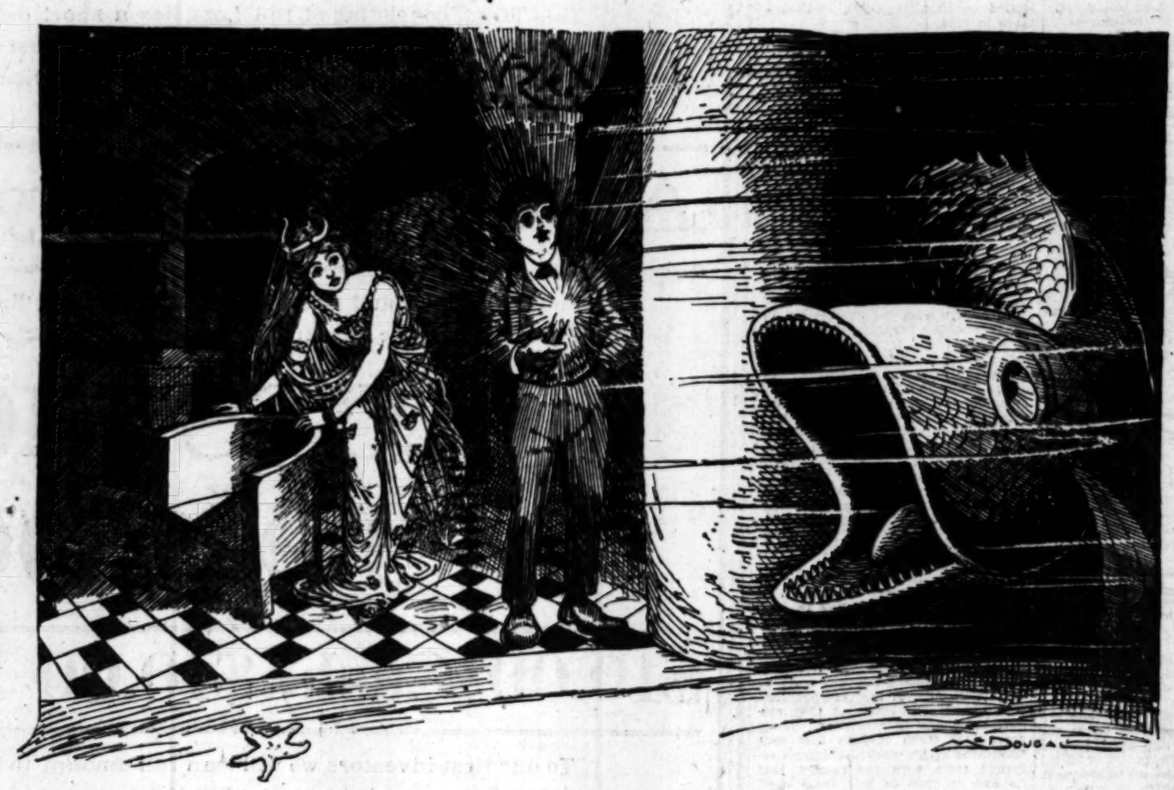
GOOD STORIES FOR CHILDREN---By Walt McDougall

Remarkable Adventure of a Bright Newsboy Who Became a Famous Electrician



The Great Fish Looked in at Them Again

DID you ever hear of The Lost Land of Lyonesse?

It was part of the coast of Cornwall and it sank into the sea perhaps fifteen hundred years ago, and now only the Scilly Islands remain of all the wondrous country where giants, wizards, fairies, knights and even dragons were to be met with any time one walked out of doors, if all the stories be true that have been related about the land of Lyonesse.

Even now, when it is but a feeble tradition, the Cornish people on the shore will tell you that bells may be heard, at times, faintly tolling down in the deep where the king's city lies forty fathoms under water; and voices singing the ancient Cornish songs.

Old rusty swords, axes, armor and spears, too, sometimes, have been drawn up in the fishermen's nets, it is said, which shows quite plainly that people once lived where the fish now rove; and when the tide is very, very low one can see tree-trunks deep in the dark water where the king hunted deer with his knights in the long ago, and the fisherfolk will tell you that they hear at times the sound of a horn beneath the waves, as if the hunters were still tracking their quarry.

But grave scientific men have long since decided that this is all rubbish, and some of them have even been bold enough to doubt the very existence of the lost land.

I always believed in it simply because I cannot conceive how anybody could have invented such a tale without any foundation, and since I came to know Davey Brady I am, of course, perfectly well convinced of its truth.

Davey Brady was a poor boy, so poor that he actually had no home; and if you can imagine any form of poverty worse than that let me know what it is. He was a city waif who sold papers, ran errands and blacked boots to earn enough money daily to secure a bed in the Newsboys' Home on winter nights. In summer he slept anywhere.

In many ways Davey was a wonder. In spite of the fact that he was hungry at all times, half-clad and homeless, he was always as merry as a grasshopper and as honest as a dog. How he had learned to read he did not know himself, yet he had managed to find out how to read the papers he sold, and, in fact, he spent some of the time he should have utilized in selling papers in reading the news.

And this poor little waif was the one who found The Lost Land of Lyonesse.

When he was about ten years old a man whose shoes he had shined at the railroad station tossed him half a dollar and ran for his train without waiting for his change. Six months afterward Davey saw him and handed him the money, saying:

"Mighty glad to see you again, mister. Here's your change."

The astonished man, who had never before seen an honest bootblack, refused to take the money after Davey had explained the matter, and he took the boy to his office and asked him all sorts of questions, after which he told him that he would take him into his factory and make a man of him, as honest boys were quite scarce and should be carefully cultivated.

The factory was an immense workshop, where everything in the way of electrical machinery was made. Dynamos, batteries, electric lights, torpedoes, machines, everything that is needed for the use of electricity was there, and Davey went to work to learn all there was to know. He worked hard and studied harder, and by the time he was fifteen, by dint of reading books and asking questions, there was no man in all the factory who was able to teach him more. Nobody remembered that he had come there a ragged guttersnipe a few years before.

When a distinguished visitor, such as a foreign minister, a prince or a great capitalist, wished to see the whole great factory, Davey was the one who was always selected to show it all, as he could best explain all the wonders in language that was simple but exact. Mr. West was so proud of him that he intended to adopt him and make him his heir.

Whenever there was a peculiarly difficult and delicate piece of machinery to be made it was Davey who had to attend to it; he was sent to the great exhibitions and World's Fairs to superintend all the work to be done, and he made many friends, for he was very good looking, besides which, and that was far more important, he was always good-natured and kindly, so it is not to be wondered at that Mr. West wished to adopt him.

One day Mr. West said:

"Dave, you are working too hard. I want you to go down to my boathouse and look at a boat you will find there."

"What shall I do with it?" asked Davey.

"Take her out and try her," replied Mr. West with a smile.

When Davey reached the boathouse, behold! there at the wharf lay a white launch with "David Brady" in gold letters along her stern. The boy saw at once that his employer had given him the dainty little craft, and he sprang into the boat eagerly, for he was very fond of sailing.

He threw the wheel over and started her down stream, and she shot away like an arrow. Over the shining bay he flew, the boat running as smoothly and as noiselessly as a sewing machine, and when he thought he had gone far enough he turned her about. But at that moment the engine banged and hammered for an instant and then stopped.

Now, one may know all about everything else under the heavens and on the earth, but there are things about a gasoline engine that are past finding out.

Davey went to work very confidently to discover the trouble, but after tinkering with pretty nearly every part of the engine he was still as far as ever from finding the defect, and all this time the swift tide was taking him out of the bay and toward the sea. Then it suddenly dawned upon him that he was in danger, for he had neither oars to row with nor anchor to stop with. Again he attacked his engine, this time in great excitement. Now, when a man gets excited over a gasoline engine something enters into it and it becomes so obstinate as to be almost maddening.

Had Davey just simply sat still and talked calmly to his machinery it is quite likely that it might have relented and become tractable, but as this was a new engine, I can't say for certain. Old ones that have been used are tamer and nicer and will often respond to kindness, but this young one was simply beyond all conception intractable and stubborn.

So when the waves began to lift his boat, and Davey saw that he was really out of the harbor and at sea, he was frightened; for a launch is not the best craft to go to sea in. Afar off on the very horizon he saw two sails, but they were too far away to see that tiny, low-lying boat, and he sat down in despair. On and on he drifted, and again and again he attacked the engine, until at last night came and covered the sea with a black mantle.

The boat rode the waves beautifully, never shipping a drop of water, and Davey at last became less concerned about the danger. Finally, tired out, he lay down on the cushioned seat and went to sleep.

The rising sun awoke him far from land, and with nothing in sight but immense waves that seemed like mountains as the boat rose and fell.

At noon, after he had toiled ceaselessly at the machinery, he saw a derelict, which is a wreck that has drifted up and down the ocean for days and days. The hulk of the vessel was but a few feet out of water, and she seemed about to sink at any moment. Davey saw, however, from the look of her, that she must have been in that condition for a long time, and as the wind was carrying him toward her, he resolved to board her in the hope of finding some food in her cabin.

It took several hours to reach her, but at last he drifted alongside, and fastening his boat climbed aboard. In the cabin, as he had hoped, he found a lot of canned food, and in her water barrel plenty of fresh water.

It did not take him long to get these things into his boat, but darkness came again when he had finished. He had a notion of remaining on the wreck, for he knew that the government sent revenue-cutters to find and destroy these derelicts, but he was greatly alarmed over the safety of his own boat as she rose and fell alongside, and finally decided to abandon the hulk.

She soon vanished in the darkness after he had left her, and again he slept.

Next day the wind blew strong from the west, carrying him along rapidly, and he saw a steamer far away, but could not attract her attention. Toward sunset he saw another much nearer yet, but she, too, passed without seeing him.

Thus three days came and went and he was in despair, for now he felt that he was far out of the track of ships and if a storm came he would be lost. Again he went to his engine, and just because he had nothing else to do threw the wheel over. There was a loud bang and off started the engine, as if nothing had ever happened at all.

Davey fell backward in amazement, for, after all, he was not well posted regarding the habits of these engines. But he was in a difficult position, for he had no compass, and as the sun was overclouded he could not tell north from south or east from west.

Still, as his engine was going he resolved to speed along steadily, but instead of going homeward he pushed on further into the ocean for another whole day. He was afraid to go to sleep and leave his engine going, but at last he had to do this, and the next day dawned with a great surprise.

When he raised himself and looked about him he saw, not more than a mile away, a gigantic iceberg, and then he was glad that he had stopped his machinery, for he might have run right into it and been wrecked. He started up easily and ran toward the iceberg to examine it, and then it was that he was surprised.

There in the ice very near the surface was a dark object which he at once took for a whale frozen into the berg, for he had read of such things, but when he sailed closer he perceived that it had an appearance vastly different from any whale he had ever seen pictured. Then he saw on the dark, indistinct mass a large lump in the centre, and, filled with curiosity, he ran along the great berg until he came to a place where he could land upon the ice and examine into the mystery.

In another minute he had seen that one end of the dark object protruded from the ice, and that it had long rows of rivets on its surface. It took him but an instant to find that it was made of iron, and the next instant to guess what it was, for he had seen more than one drawing of such objects. It was a submarine boat.

How it had become frozen in that immense iceberg he could not guess; but there it was, and already more than half thawed out. Under the hot summer sun the ice was melting and pouring down the crannies in noisy rivulets of fresh water, and the submarine boat was only ten feet from the sea-water level.

Dave, now that he was sure of water to drink, for as you may know ice is always fresh no matter where you may find it, decided to remain right there until the mysterious iron craft was released from its prison and then to examine it carefully, for there certainly must be something wonderful in a boat that had gone so far north as to be entombed in solid ice. Once inside of the submarine boat Dave was quite sure that he could solve the mystery; all there was to do was to wait.

He got back into his own vessel, and for several days he cruised around or lay beside the berg, watching the great form become ever more distinct, until one day, perhaps because the iron boat gathered heat more quickly than ice, there was a loud cracking sound and the ice parted, letting the submarine boat slide down and rest half-in and half out of the water.

Then its release came quickly, for next day, it was floating with its round hump out of water, and Dave fastened his rope to a ring on its top.

After climbing on board and making fast, he hauled and pushed at the top of its hump, which had a lid like a big pot, but it was only when he thought of screwing it off that it moved. He soon had it off then and looked down into the dark interior.

Then by a ladder he descended, to find himself surrounded by a mass of machinery that was electric, as he instantly saw, and within two hours he had thoroughly mastered the details of it all. He saw how the boat was moved, how it sank or rose beneath the water, how it was supplied with air; but there were no papers to tell him its history, not a thing to explain how such a boat could be in such a mysterious predicament.

There was plenty of canned goods, flour, vegetables and other necessaries on board, but no water was in the water receptacles. These he filled at once from the rivulets on the iceberg, for he saw a chance to secure far more water than his own boat would carry, and then he started to tow his prize away.

The submarine boat was not much larger than his own, but she did pull him back dreadfully and he found that he was making very slow progress; but after a time, when the wind increased and the waves became more threatening than they had been for days, he began to fear that he would have to give up the task; yet, when he reflected that the submarine boat was far safer than his own in mid-ocean, he at last, with much regret, deserted his launch and climbed into the prize.

He made the change just in time, for a storm soon broke that compelled him to close the lid of the hump and depend entirely upon the submarine, which, in the tremendous waves that beset her, rolled to and fro like a big cucumber.

After an hour of this Dave went to work and soon mastered every detail of the machinery, after which he sank to a depth where the waves were no longer felt; then he moved along serenely, with his electric lights illuminating the darkness ahead, like a great whale.

There was a cunning little electric stove to cook on, a cozy little couch, and rugs on the floor, and, indeed, it was far more comfortable than his open boat, and here there was no danger of collision or shipwreck. There were maps hanging on the walls and a compass to steer by, and one touch on the tiny wheel turned the Whale, as he called her, in any direction instantly.

"I shall have some fun in this," he said, when he had thoroughly comprehended everything and found that his knowledge of electricity made him complete master of this unknown craft. "There's no reason why I should regret the loss of the launch. I can make some important discoveries in this craft."

Then he ran ahead at full speed to test her powers, and found that the Whale could make, without the least difficulty or straining, a hundred miles an hour, which astonished him very much, as no such speed was ever made by any boat before, but the speed registers proved it beyond a doubt.

"At this rate," he thought, "I will soon be near the shores of Europe, and will be running into Spain, England or France with a hard bump."

Great fish swam beside him, but none could keep up with the Whale as she darted along, while Dave studied all the wonders of her construction. He found that a little bell rang when she neared the shore or the bottom, which was very useful, as in the ocean, as on land, are giant peaks that rise from sheer deeps almost to the surface or form islands; and there was a device that showed how far below the surface the boat was; another told when the air was becoming foul; another showed the pressure of the water on her steel sides. While studying these wonders he took no thought of time, and the hours passed like minutes; so he was surprised after what appeared like a little space, to hear the bell give warning that the boat was nearing shore.

He ran slower and looked ahead carefully, but, of course, was not at all alarmed, for he knew that the shore slanted gradually upward. Finally some large square rocks loomed up before him and made him go still slower.

As he neared them his eyes filled with wonder, for they seemed like great buildings at the sea's bottom.

Nearer he came, and then to his surprise he was assured that they were buildings, moss-grown and green, but still human constructions, down there in a couple of hundred feet of water. There were great pointed windows, devoid of glass, towers round and square, arched doorways, bastions and turrets to one immense structure, while smaller and more modest buildings clustered around its base.

He made his way carefully among them all, until he had seen every bit of this marvel, and his surprise increased every moment; for, you see, although Dave had read very much he never heard of the sunken Land of Lyonesse, and this was the city of the king upon which he had chanced. The dark walls towered up beside him and seemed to reach to the surface of the water; sea-anemones grew amid the green sea-weed over the great stones like ivy, but waving long arms in the current, so that the building seemed to move as if bewitched.

Fish darted gleaming hither and thither, yet, strangely enough, they did not invade the open doors or windows, and this puzzled Dave. Was there something within the dark interior that threatened them?

He came opposite the huge door and flashed his light within, and saw a long hall, its floor strewn with rushes and its walls hung with tapestry of many colors, while here and there chairs and tables of ancient design were scattered about. Weapons, too, he saw on the walls, and horns of great deer, horns that measured eight or nine feet in width from tip to tip.

He resolved to invade this castle, but he decided to wait until daylight, which was two hours off as yet. In the meantime he explored the submarine city, flashing his light into the windows of the houses here and there, and everywhere seeing ancient relics.

When he returned to the great castle the faint gray light of the sun was turning its sides to a lighter green, but even after he had waited two hours longer there was so little sunlight at that depth that he despaired of its lighting the gloom within. Then he determined to boldly enter the dark vault before him in spite of the thing that seemed to frighten the fish. He started, and then as he reached the door the boat stopped as though held by a cable.

Dave could see nothing and went forward, but there was nothing visible holding her back. Then he suddenly realized that this was not water before him, but air. Opening the porthole he found that it was so. In some marvelous manner the castle was full of air, which kept out the water and fish as well.

He climbed out of the porthole and dropped to the floor, and at the same moment felt the Whale lurch as if struck from the rear. Looking back he saw the head of an immense fish, white and ghastly, with eyes luminous and gleaming, nosing the stern of the boat. Before he could say Jack Robinson the great fish vanished.

"My!" said Dave. "If I had been aboard that would have given me a chill!"

He climbed into his porthole again and got a hand-lamp, an electric light which can be carried, and then returned to the hall of the castle. There he examined everything with immense curiosity, for he now saw that all must be centuries and centuries old that lay here. But the puzzle was as great as ever; nothing explained how it had happened that this castle should be here and filled with air.

He saw a broad stairway before him, and climbed it, every footfall on the stone ringing out bell-like, and entered a large room hung with tapestry.

Flashing the light before him upon a great bed pillared like a temple, he was startled to see lying there a beautiful maiden asleep, breathing softly, rosy with health amid all that gloom. He stopped, half frightened, for this he had not expected at all, then approached her.

A Sleeping Princess Found in a Deserted Castle in the Lost Land of Lyonesse

She was so beautiful that he held his [breath] fearing that she would vanish like the [ghost] but no, she was real; he touched her cheek [and] find that she was warm and alive. Then he [laughed] and said:

"Ha! The Sleeping Beauty! Just like [the] tale! I will kiss her, as the prince did, [and] she will wake up!"

When he kissed her her long lashes [trembled] then he kissed her again. Her eyelids lifted, revealing lovely blue eyes that looked up at him surprise. Then the girl sat up and said:

"Where am I? Who are you?"

"My name is David Brady, but I do not know where you are. I have never been here," said he, smiling.

"The light dazzles me," she cried. "Are you a conjuror?"

The Princess of Lyonesse, for it was she, [rose] up and sprang to the floor, then passed her hand over her troubled brow.

"Ah, I now remember all!" she cried. "The deluge, the flight of our people, the sinking of land! All, all my dreadful work!"

"When did it happen?" asked Dave, for [he] that she was distressed and wished to talk, as he knew that eases the female mind than anything else.

"'Twas but yesternight," replied the Princess, "when it came with a vast roaring and crashing, and men came hastening from afar to warn us. I [laughed] ed when they told me that the sea was coming, told them that Loraine, the enchantress, would [keep] back the sea, for I did not believe there was danger. I wished only to keep them in awe of me.

"But it overwhelmed me, even when I was [laughing] ing at my father's fears. The sea rolled in and overwhelmed us all; the land was under water. I uttered the magic spell that I thought would [put] me into a deep sleep and end it all forever, [but] you tell me, strange knight, that this castle is [many] oms deep under the sea?"

"Yes, forty fathoms, I guess," replied Dave, [laughing] all this happened hundreds and hundreds of years ago, for I have read nothing in history about it. What was the name of this place?"

"This was beautiful Lyonesse!" replied the Princess Loraine. "The fairest land in all the world. Ruined by me, the witch! Alas!"

"So you thought you were a witch?" said Dave, smiling; for like all well-educated persons he had no belief in witches.

"Ah, I am a great enchantress!" she replied. "Would I wished I could change you, sir knight, to a swan or a heron, summon cockatrices and dragons or fiery dragons, waft myself over the sea, even to the moon! Do you not tremble?"

She looked at him carefully, but he was only laughing, and then he said:

"You must have taken something to have preserved you all these centuries, but I am not afraid of you. You are too pretty for a real witch, and honest, is this all true?"

She assured him that it was, and then took her hand and led her below where she could not have deserted the castle was.

As they walked through the great building they talked.

"I suppose this place is in England, isn't it, Lyonesse?" asked the boy.

"England! I never heard of that land," replied. "Where is it?"

"My gracious!" cried Dave, "but you do [come] from a long way back. Why, every little girl of years old knows about England nowadays. You must be older than the Norsemen!"

"I have heard of the dread Norsemen," she replied, "but they have never been in Lyonesse, though we have seen their ships at sea like [some] ill-omen hovering afar."

"I am afraid, when you get up on earth again, that you will have a lot of studying to do," said Dave. "How old are you?"

"I am fourteen," she replied, "but I know all a princess is taught—embroidering, falconry, dancing, dressing wounds, and, besides, much of witchcraft and astrology."

"Well, that's a start," said Dave, "but I would like to learn all that you will have to."

When they had reached the very top of the castle the Princess said: "This is where I practiced alone here with the shades of demons."

"Did you ever see any?" asked Dave.

"No," she reluctantly admitted. "Perhaps my incantations were wrong. But—"

"Well, I'll tell you right now that there are such things and you were wasting time," said the boy. "You had better have learned plain sense. Now, as there's nobody here, we will get in my boat and go ashore, where you will begin all over again."

"Let me get my pearls and diamonds first," said the Princess, "for it would be a shame to leave them behind."

She went to a great oaken chest and took out string after string of large pearls and diamonds, gems that flashed like stars in the electric light and dazzled the boy. Then they climbed into the boat by a little porthole, and Dave started the motor.

The voyage was not interrupted until the boat came to the surface in a harbor, where it was filled with great astonishment by all the sailors on ships anchored there.

The arrival of the Whale was a wonder, but when the story of Loraine was told, and when the antiquarians and historians questioned her about the long-forgotten land and found that she was telling only the truth, the wonder was simply world-wide.

Kings and queens sent for her to hear her story and to see her marvelous gems, and many of them were bought by monarchs, for indeed they were so valuable that none but monarchs, newspaper proprietors and Standard Oil magnates could afford more than admire and ask the price of them.

So, when some years after Loraine had been to school and learned so many things that astonished it made her dizzy, she was married to Dave, and Mr. West was the best man. Even now, they say, they take an occasional trip in the Whale, and I suspect they steal away to the drowned city to talk over the strange things that happened.

HIS RECOLLECTIONS AND REFLECTIONS.

"ABRAHAM LINCOLN."

WHEN so long ago as 1860, Chicago, from lake to forest, was a succession of inspirations. As the salt infused the soul of every Athenian, so the spirit of creative thought seemed to possess the mind of every man who entered her gates. If not a sermon there seemed at least a purpose animating the very stones of her streets. She is an epitome of that progress which has been "spinning down the ringing grooves of time" ever since the Genoese set sail in search of a western passage to the Indies, and amid desolating fire and commercial panic she has answered fate as Columbus answered the fainthearted sailor who questioned him—

"What shall I say, great captain, say,
If we sight naught but seas at dawn?
Why you shall say, at break of day,
Sail on, sail on, sail on and on."

There was ever an unseen, unvoiced power of growth in Chicago that lead along unexpected ways to achievement, like steps that lead to heights. Enterprises burst forth from her soil, and clasped the light and sucked the air of strength. Men planned and their plans outran their clutch as with a momentum that could not be stayed. Men died, and yet the thought they planted multiplied in a hundred fields. As from the ridge of the great Northwest the rilling and impartial waters sever, one part flowing northward and eastward through lake and strait, roaring over cataract and seething through rapids to the surging Atlantic—the other part gliding westward and southward to recruit the tawny current that carries the wash of a continent to the Mexican gulf; so this great city of saltless sea divided her forces. Millionaire and pauper, poet and pork-packer all were welcome to march in the ranks of her armies. She bade the stalwart soldier of fortune to fall in, and placed her strong arm about the shy unrecognized child of genius, dumb and halting, maybe, with discouragement and despair, and steadied him on his feet in the procession, imposing no conditions but to keep step.

In this mighty city the strong, clear chant of earnest endeavor, the continuous tread of huge-limbed labor, the flexible yet tenacious mentality, the eager outreaching spirit of "get on" has ever been manifest and catchy. Not that the life is feverish or hysterical as in a new mining camp, or a city of climate and boom. By no means. But a handful of the seed of empire fell upon this favored acreage, where only a grain was wasted out to other lands, and it grew because it could not help but grow.

The bronzes of conquest were once stolen from the column Vendome in Paris, because they perpetuated the memory of triumphs won through the blood and the tears of the people, to gratify the vanity of an Emperor who dominated the world that he might illumine a throne. But Chicago's commemorative columns and arches are her iron-laced highways, her marts of trade, her palaces of industry, her miles of beautiful homes. The record of her victories is greater than that of the Greek who boasted that he never caused an Athenian to put on mourning, for she can say that her growth was so directed and her industries so controlled by master minds, that the anthem of her march to greatness has ever been the cheery music of contented and well-paid toil.

The great wigwam in Chicago, near the river, where the Republican National Convention assembled in 1860, lacked the appointments and conveniences now possessed by almost every public hall. Electric lights were then unknown. The telephone girl, with gum in her mouth and a suitor at her side, did not respond to the calls of impatient customers with the irritating words, "line busy." The motorman had not been evolved and street cars were still propelled by impenitent mules, and the Tremont House—six feet below the level of the street, was the leading hotel of the Northwest, with rates at $2 per day.

The wigwam, with its ten thousand cheering auditors, its fluttering banners, and its platform on which were seated as delegates hundreds of the brightest intellects in America, presented a picture which will never fade from the eyes of those who were privileged to behold it. As a local reporter for the Milwaukee Free Democrat I was accorded a place at a long table in the center of the platform only a few feet from where the white-haired abolition leader, Joshua R. Giddings, of Ohio, sat by the side of his colleague, the trumpet-voiced David K. Carter.

The Seward forces were represented by the suave and masterful William M. Evarts of New York, who in turn, was counselled by that veteran of caucus and convention, Thurlow Weed, the head of the Albany regency. Pennsylvania presented an apparent candidate in the person of Simon Cameron, but his delegates never seriously expected his nomination, and his followers were marshaled and kept together really for the purpose of obtaining promises, the fulfillment of which would insure to the advantage of the clan.

Before the Chicago convention of 1860 assembled, slavery had been routed in its efforts to capture Kansas and Nebraska. Nevertheless, the "peculiar institution" refused to accept defeat. Its avowed motto was "rule or ruin" and it girded its loins anew for the contest of 1860. The result of that contest was no longer doubtful. The Democratic party was rent in twain, the great North had broken its shackles, and the very air was electric with the presage of the coming triumph of freedom.

Yet to achieve triumph the members of the Chicago convention felt that there was needed not merely a leader but a leader of leaders. A man for the times was demanded, and the God of the Eternities presented him in the person of Abraham Lincoln.

He was the child of poverty and toil. Not the hopeless poverty and cringing toil of those who labor amid the din of European marts, but the manly submission to privation and unmastered toil of the Western pioneer, whose eye of fate beholds the star of hope shining above the clouds, and who in his dreams of the future drapes himself with the Senator's toga or the judge's gown. He was self-made and self-reliant, but never self-seeking or self-sufficient. He was honest, not with that nurtured integrity which too often proves an exotic that dies with the first blast of adversity, but he was honest by instinct and because it never occurred to him to be other than honest.

He was in spirit and in fact one of and one with the people, and he needed no guide to find the way to their hearts. He loved liberty of action, of speech, and of thought, and in so far as his generous and chivalric soul would suffer him to hate anything, he hated tyranny and meanness, and shams. He was a master of speech. His passion and pathos and humor were matchless, and as a logician he was peerless. His iron-rimmed syllogisms crushed sophisms as if they were egg shells. His wit, his philosophy, his strong saving common sense, his quaint forms of expression have filled our political literature with familiar apothegms.

What better rebuke to dogmatism than the phrase "Everybody is wiser than anybody?" What clearer description of a republic than "Government of the people, by the people, for the people?" What more complete destruction of a sophism than his answer to the contention that slavery might be excluded from a territory by unfriendly legislation, "Judge Douglas," said he, "holds that a thing may be lawfully driven away from a place where it has a lawful right to go." What annihilating sarcasm in his reply to those who insisted that Republican success would entail negro equality and miscegenation. "Because I do not want a colored woman for my slave," said he, "it does not follow that I do want her for my wife. My understanding is that I can just let her alone."

The argument against secession he stated in a sentence, "Can aliens make treaties easier than friends can make laws?" What grander plea for human liberty than this appeal to Congress in behalf of the passage of the thirteenth amendment? "In giving freedom to the slave," said he, "we assure freedom to the free, honorable alike, in what we give and in what we preserve. We shall nobly save or meanly lose the last best hope of earth." What more comprehensive statement of the duty of the hour than the familiar sentence, "With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness for the right as God gives us to see the right?"

There are many words of Lincoln so fitly and grandly said that they will burn in the sky of history like fixed stars, when the masterpieces of great orators shall have vanished with their train of rhetorical splendors into space. There are ideas of his which victorious armies placed upon their eagles and carried to a grander fruition than ever a prophet foretold or poet dreamed. Never was ruler or representative truer to a trust than he. His reigning animating purpose was to preserve the geographical integrity and political unity of the United States in America, and to this was added as an outgrowth of the war, a determination to extend the blessings of freedom to every human being dwelling beneath the shelter of its flag.

He never lost sight of this purpose. He was conservative when the premature adoption of radical measures might have alienated the wavering, and weakened the Union cause. He was radical when the power of time and circumstance crumbled the barriers of prejudice which for years had obstructed the path to justice. His individualism was never absorbed or subverted even by the genius and power of the great men who counselled him. Without being egotistic, or dogmatic, or stubborn, he was firm. He "took each man's counsel," but "preserved his own judgment." Without previous training in the conduct of public affairs he was called upon to grasp the reins of government when the chariot of state was rocking amid the convulsions of war. But he kept a steady hand, and neither the terrified counsels of overcautious conservatism, nor the demands of unthinking and improvident zeal could drive him from the path along which he believed the safety of the nation demanded that he should guide his countrymen. It was his privilege to select the best policy for the time, and his gift of discrimination was little short of marvelous. He stands approved by the popular judgment both of his times and of later history as seldom having made a mistake. He was sometimes deceived in his judgment of men, but he was hardly ever at fault in his judgment of measures. Understanding the American people better than many men of greater experience and statesmanship he never entertained a doubt as to the final issue of the contest. When disaster encompassed us and defeat held back our armies he confidently called for more men. Sustained by his imperturable trust in the righteousness of our cause, and in the power and willingness of the people to meet all requirements, he pressed steadily onward to that perfect consummation of national peace, unity and freedom, which, with a faith born of prescience he felt would be sure to come and which he almost lived to see.

Mr. Lincoln had a dual nature. The gravity of his demeanor enhanced the humor of his jests, and the wit of his jests gave strength to the arguments they illustrated. Many of his anecdotes have found their way into print, and it is not the purpose of the writer to make these papers a vehicle for the recital of thrice-told tales. One or two anecdotes will serve to illustrate the quickness of his wit. During the Lincoln-Douglas debates, the Prince of Wales and his suite were traveling in Illinois and attended upon several of these famous discussions. Among the English party was a young gentleman who was a good deal "fresh," and like many other travelers, had left his good breeding at home. He had been introduced to and had conversed with Mr. Lincoln and felt privileged to address him. At one of the towns where there was to be an afternoon debate Mr. Lincoln arrived about the noon hour, and proceeded at once to the country tavern where he was to have quarters. He was dusty from the ride, and without waiting to be shown to his room, went into the general washroom, and taking the implements left there for that purpose, proceeded to polish his boots. "Oh! Mr. Lincoln, I am surprised," said the cub, who had followed him in, "in my country a gentleman does not black his own boots." "No?" said Mr. Lincoln, polishing away, "whose boots then does he black?"

Of a legislative colleague in Congress, who was given to frequent changes of opinion, Mr. Lincoln said that his method possessed some advantages, for when he desired to absent himself he could—inasmuch as he spoke one way and voted another—always pair off with himself. Of his opponent, Douglas, after the latter had been driven by Lincoln into the declaration which alienated from the little giant all southern support, Mr. Lincoln said, "Steve has now a brilliant future—behind him."

The history of the National Republican Convention of 1860 has been again and again recited. I shall not attempt to recall its details. There is left upon my mind only the memory of the hour when the cohorts of the master creative spirit of Republicanism, the strong, philosophical, indomitable Seward, fell back step by step before the rising, swelling, advancing tide, and amid the waving of thousands of banners, the great Saxon roar of victory went up from tens of thousands of throats and all Illinois shouted Abraham Lincoln into the Presidency.

The great party which Lincoln first led to national victory was, in his day, an expression of the brains and conscience and patriotism of the nation. May it continue as such, and never become a Satrap, scourged and weary, running in chains at the chariot wheels of Plutus. May it live unswindled by the hucksters of the caucus and undebauched by the bawds of the lobby. May it live with ears unattuned to the clink of the briber's gold, and with brow unbranded with the scarlet letter of shame. May it live with its foreign policies unshaped by the magnates of trusts, and its finances unruled by bankers' syndicates. May the harvest of prosperity which its sway is bringing to the nation not be blighted by the hot and greedy blasts of selfishness while the corn is yet in the milk.

California's Charm.

You will not find everything in Southern California. You will miss the wide stretches of green in the open places, far removed from the dusty cities, the noble trees, the clear streams of water, the blue lake nestled in among the pine-clad mountains; you will miss that splendid miracle, the change of the seasons, when your whole nature comes into closer touch with the great mother heart of nature than at any other time in all the year.

Yes, you will miss much; but when you have been here a year, when month after month of rare and beautiful weather blend into each other, when the sea wooes you and the flowers charm you and the brown mountains beckon you and the soft air soothes you, after a year has passed you find there are some compensations for the lovely things you have left behind you, you come to realise that nature has done more for this stretch of sea and mountain girt land than she has done for any other spot on the globe.

You may have been charmed with California when you came, you may have been captivated after you had been here a year, you may capitulate and consent to be captured by the time two golden summers have stolen over you.—[World Today.

How Cities are Governed in Great Britain.

LONDON.

BY FREDERICK UPHAM ADAMS.
[SPECIALLY CONTRIBUTED TO THE TIMES.]

GREAT BRITAIN is in the throes of a revolution. Her antique customs and venerated institutions are in process of destruction. From out their ruins there is rearing the framework of an edifice which may glorify a new civilization. The revolutionists are in absolute control, yet their numberless victories have been won without a blow struck in anger. I claim credit for a discovery. The United States is the most conservative nation on the globe and Great Britain is the most radical. We smile at the visionary and hesitate to grant his theories the favor of a bored tolerance; Great Britain elects him to office, indorses and adopts his fancies and by the expenditure of countless millions of treasure, willingly raised, transforms his dreams into monumental and seemingly practical realities.

In the United States the proposition that our cities should own and operate such utilities as street railways, gas and electric lighting plants and other works susceptible of monopolistic control, has not far progressed beyond the stage of academic discussion. In more than one hundred of the large cities of the United Kingdom the right of private ownership in such properties has been repealed by legal enactments. Those of us whose knowledge of what has happened is confined to occasional newspaper comments has not the faintest conception of the stupendous momentum of this movement, or of what it portends, not in England alone, but to every civilized country on the face of the earth. Even more startling is the paradox that this municipal radicalism has developed among a people who yet rapidly cling to obsolete customs and traditions, and whose commercial and manufacturing prestige is menaced by their refusal to adopt methods and devices of proved superiority. It shall be my purpose in the articles which follow to show in sharp but accurate contrasts the products of the new radicalism and the time-worn institutions which surround them. I may wander at times from the exact limits of my subject, but that is one of the privileges of an author who travels beyond the confines of his familiar horizon.

For three days our steamship plowed through the long heave of the North Atlantic, the freshly painted deckwork glistening in the rays of an unclouded December sun pointing her bow steadily toward Lands end. The gentle breeze was laden with the caressing balm of spring. The sun blazed away at the starboard promenade deck, compelling the casting aside of wraps and rugs. The weather was at which our would expect in June, holding an even keel on that parallel of latitude which bisects Hudson's Bay, it seemed difficult to realize that more than a thousand miles to the south of us the United States was laden with snow and blocked by ice.

The morning dawned gloriously on the day we were to have our first view of the out-jutting land of England. The Scilly Isles were due to raise their jagged crests on the eastern horizon at about noon, and as the hour approached scores of glasses were leveled in that direction. At 10 o'clock there was not a suspicion of vapor beneath the huge vault of sky and sea. Like magic the aspect of the seascape changed. Between us and England there was reared a wall of smokelike fog. Swirling clouds of mist writhed above our heads. The sun struggled bravely for a moment and then disappeared, nor did I see a face again save at brief and rare intervals for more than two months when homeward bound and far out on the Atlantic.

The observation is probably not original, but a sojourn in the great English metropolis and in the provincial cities of the United Kingdom, combined with a study of its business men and their methods, suggests the theory that their traditional and boasted conservatism is nothing more nor less than the evolutionary outcome of successive generations spent in a land inclosed and mist limited horizon.

It may be set down as a plausible proposition that the inhabitants of any community who for long periods of time are denied a range of vision not exceeding a few hundred yards must be more than ordinarily gifted with imagination in order to escape the handicap of mental narrowness. This theory is fortified by the fact that your traveled Englishman broadens so rapidly and thoroughly that he bears only the faintest resemblance to those who yet peer dimly adown the vaporous streets of London, Birmingham, Manchester, Glasgow and other cities.

When the sun shines in Great Britain at any time during the six cold and wet months of the year the fact is duly recorded in the papers as an interesting item of news. I was assured that there are places where sunshine is not regarded as a phenomenon, but I could not find them, nor did I talk with anyone who had. Those who lack the money with which to escape from this awful climate and spend the season in Southern France or Italy, risk the salvation of their immortal souls by asserting that they love fog, and chant the praises of smoke-grimed and mist-choked old London.

The following morning found us well up the dreaded English Channel. On this occasion it was smooth as the proverbial mill pond. This destroyed another of my illusions to the effect that this particular reach of water is always rough. On the return trip it was even more smooth. We circled into the mouth of the Thames, feeling our way cautiously through the fog, past the wrecks of ships which had run aground or sunk under similar circumstances. At times the fog lifted enough to give a glimpse of the low, muddy and uninteresting shores of this famous river.

Another illusion went by the board when a long, rakish craft belonging to the Royal Custom's Department challenged our progress, cast a line on board and made fast to our port quarter. I had always read and, of course, implicitly believed that England was the one free trade nation on the globe where the pilgrim's personal effects were not made the object of the prying inspection of minions of a custom office. But not so. No soiled sock or guilty pajama escaped the keen eyes or ruthless fingers of the uniformed men who swarmed the decks where the luggage had been placed.

Two months later a New York customs inspector accepted my word that my satchels and trunks contained nothing dutiable, and did not even open them for a glance at their innocent contents. One learns from travel things not written in the books.

Having successfully stood the test of his majesty's officials we were permitted to land on English soil at Tilbury. This town is about twenty-five miles from London, and we were assured that a special train was awaiting us to whisk us into the metropolis. The American who can restrain a smile at the first sight of an English railway train is either absolutely lacking in the sense of humor or is depressed over a recent death in his family. They look like the toy trains one expects to find at Coney Island or at kindred resorts which make a specialty of freaks.

All of these points and others which I shall mention from time to time are familiar to those who have traveled in England, but I am attempting to write for the benefit of those who have not, and whose impressions are derived from authors who rave about ruined castles, moated granges, terraced slopes and other lovely things. The young woman from Central Illinois who writes those entrancing English society novels would never attempt another if she could see her hero and heroine begin their honeymoon trip in a typical first-class English railway train.

It may be possible to design a structure more unsightly and uncomfortable than the standard English compartment passenger car, but no one has yet succeeded in doing it. It is difficult to describe it and more so to comprehend the excuse for its existence. Take a small freight car just high enough for a well-proportioned man to stand erect in. From floor to roof erect three or four partitions so as to completely separate one "compartment" from another. Then place two benches in each compartment so that they will face one another. The backs must be perfectly straight, and under no circumstances must any attempt be made to conform to the curves which an all-wise Providence designed for the human body. Each bench holds five passengers, and when properly seated their knees should strike and their feet interlock. Overhead are shelves for "luggage." You are allowed to put anything in a compartment which will go through the side doors. They do not check baggage in England, and if you do not carry it with you it is likely to be lost. There is a "luggage van" for articles of the size of baby carriages. On most trains there are three classes of compartments, viz., first, second and third class. The fares on the third class are about half those on the first, and those on the second class half way between, but since the accommodations are practically the same in all of these, the average traveler saves his money by patronizing the third class cars. Were it not for the signs one would have no way of knowing whether he were in a first or a third-class compartment.

Most of the station officials were aged men, some of whom probably knew Stevenson when he was a boy. Six of us took our seats in a compartment. It was a cold, raw day and the compartment contained no steam coils or other devices for giving heat. An Englishman entered and wrapped his feet and legs up in a "traveling rug." Unless you carry one of these heavy and cumbersome things about with you in England pneumonia will mark you for an untimely end. I had no rug, and the outlook was desperate. At this crisis the door opened again and a station employé slid a long rectangular piece of metal along the floor, dropping it with a dull thud.

"What is that?" I asked of an English fellow passenger, ashamed a moment later of my shocking display of ignorance.

He evidently resented my addressing him without the formality of an introduction, but yielded enough to inform me that it was a "foot warmer." He removed his glove, placed his hand fearlessly upon it and looked at his companion with a slight expression of surprise on his face.

"It's warm, do't you know!" he said.

"My word; it is! Extraordinary!" exclaimed the other. We all solemnly placed our hands upon it and felt the pleasing sensation of heat.

"What makes it hot?" I asked, determined to pursue my investigation to the bitter end.

"It's filled with hot water," answered my English friend, with a pitying smile. Somehow, I felt that he suspected I was an American. His next words confirmed that suspicion.

"You don't have those in America?" he said with a rising inflection.

"Our country folk use something like it when they go bob-sled riding," I said, anxious to prove that my native country is well abreast of the progress of the age. "When I was a boy my mother used to wrap a hot brick in a flannel cloth and put it in the bed to warm our feet. We have a great many of the modern improvements, even if ours is a new and undeveloped country," I concluded, fearing to say more, for fear that he would think me boastful, like so many of my countrymen.

We pulled out from the station and soon got under a moderate headway. The sensation seemed familiar as we jolted over the rails, but it was some moments before I could remember where I had experienced it in former years. Then the recollection of stolen rides on the rear car of a branch line freight train came back to me. It was like renewing one's youth. One car was guiltless of springs and the axles were fastened rigidly to the frame on the same mechanical principle that small boys construct a wagon from a dry goods box with the heads of cheese boxes for wheels. When we hit a curve the wheels had to slip and skid in order to make up the difference. It struck me as rather primitive, but thrilling and interesting. While I was thinking about it we stopped at a station and one of our passengers showed unmistakable signs of an intention to get out.

Now the exit from the standard English train, even when it has come to a standstill at a station, is rather a serious matter for a novice. On many trains the doors are locked from the outside by a station employé, and when you reach your destination you must wait to have it unlocked or else open the window—if you can—and crawl out. But in this instance the door was not locked, and the operation of escaping was comparatively simple. There is no knob, handle or other opening device on the inside—why, no one seems to know—so the wise traveler lowers the window, reaches out his hand by a contortive effort and turns the fastening, which is exactly similar to that on the ordinary public hack or carriage. Then he alights, letting in a blast of cold air. The one sitting nearest the door is supposed to close the window. When the conductor desires to collect or inspect tickets the train is halted at a station long enough to permit him to open each separate door for that purpose. No one calls out the next station or the one at which you have stopped.

As an example of how not to do a thing the English railroad is without a peer in this boundless universe. There are better trains in the kingdom than the one from Tilbury, but the one just faintly described is a fair sample of what one has to patronize, unless making long and direct journeys. It is impossible to put in print the terrors and discomforts of a day spent in a "compartment car." It is not an uncommon thing for women to be maltreated and even murdered without being able to make an outcry or in any way attract attention. You are likely to be locked up with a besotted human beast and forced to endure his company for hours. The bigoted, home-raised Englishman objects to the modern American type of railway coach on the ground that it is "too promiscuous." He says he wishes "seclusion." A hog in a pen might raise the same objection to an open pasture.

It took us an hour and twenty minutes to run the twenty-five miles. As we neared the confines of London the pall of smoke and fog darkened. In the London station one would have thought it midnight, but it was not yet 3 o'clock of that December afternoon. There were no clouds only smoke and fog.

My first impression of London as the cab swung out of St. Pancras Station and through a maze of crooked streets, was the absolute perfection of the stone payments over which we were driving. There are thousands of miles of solid stone pavements in London, almost as smooth as newly-laid asphalt, and I doubt if any city in the United States can duplicate a hundred yards of it. There is no secret or deep mystery concerning the manner in which this overweening superiority has been attained. English cities expend vast sums of money on their street pavements. They spend it honestly, intelligently, and lay a pavement to last, not a year, but a century. I shall have more to say on this subject later.

My second impression was that there were no street obstructions. On every hand old buildings were being torn down and new and grander ones rearing in their places. Many of the streets are narrow, but no piles of brick nor steaming mortar beds filled one foot of the space of the thoroughfare. No delivery wagons backed up to a curb and deliberately unloaded while a procession of vehicles formed in line to await the convenience of a lazy and impudent driver. From curb to curb the streets of London are absolutely reserved for traffic. No city in the world has so stupendous a traffic, and in no city are horses so rapidly driven, yet accidents are so rare as to be almost unheard of.

Traffic holds to the left instead of to the right, as in our country, and in most others. The driver who swings a foot across the center of the street is liable to arrest and severe punishment. At all crossings of consequence are "isles of safety"—oval raised spaces in which the pedestrian can stand until the way is clear for his passage. New York, Chicago and other American cities are in the infant class so far as the regulation of street traffic is concerned, when one watches the clockwork precision on London's swarming highways.

And who directs this miracle? The London "bobby"—the clubless, unarmed, silent and undemonstrative London policeman. I first saw him at work when the cabby turned into Trafalgar Square, circled past the National Gallery and was about to turn into the Strand. Ahead of us and behind us was an unbroken line of cabs, buses and vehicles of all descriptions. To the right another glittering line was swiftly passing. We had just reached the angle formed by the Strand and St. Martin's lane when a man wearing an oilcloth helmet and a long waterproof cape raised the forefinger of his right hand. I doubt if the driver tightened the reins. Even the cab horses know what that raised forefinger means. We stopped right then and there. The entire line halted like a toy railroad train which runs against a parlor wall. Across the opening my companion pointed to a prancing team and a carriage with a glittering crest.

"That's the Duke of Bedford," he said. "It would have made no difference were it the equipage of the Prince of Wales."

It was as he said. Rich and poor, high and low, aristocrat and plebeian, stand on one democratic plane when it comes to crossing a street in London. Only the King has the right of way, and he seldom uses it. Through the parted stream of traffic the foot passengers passed in safety, like the Children of Israel, when Moses raised his wand and parted the waves of the Red Sea. Thus on hundreds of street intersections vehicles yield to pedestrians and pedestrians to vehicles, both great tides checked intermittently to move again steadily and swiftly on.

"All of these drivers cannot be paragons of virtue and 'discipline,'" I said to my London friend, as the officer gave the signal that we might go on. "Suppose our cabby had disregarded that raised forefinger? He would have been arrested, I presume?"

"Not now," replied my instructor. "That would have stopped traffic, and nothing is permitted to do that. The officer would have taken his number, and he would have been arrested tomorrow morning, or possibly this evening. He might serve a jail sentence or lose his license, or possibly both. It is very seldom that a driver violates the rules of the road. Whenever a pedestrian is injured it is generally his own fault. In Germany, when a street accident occurs, they arrest the one who is run over, and do not molest the driver. They assume that the pedestrian is to blame, hold him for disturbing the peace, and in nine instances out of ten they are right."

There are hundreds of streets in London which bear a traffic far in excess of Fifth Avenue, New York, but the police have not the slightest difficulty in handling it. When one pauses to consider that nearly 500 persons were killed last year on the streets of New York alone, and that thousands were crippled and maimed for life, it would seem the part of common sense to profit from the example of London, a city with a vastly greater traffic and one moving with much greater velocity and in which deaths are almost unknown and accidents reduced to the minimum. The remedy is simplicity itself. Enact a plain law, and back up the crossings officers in their enforcement of it.

It would not take a year to curb the brutes who run down pedestrians in our larger cities. They do not permit children to drive horses in London's streets. You never see an officer spring at a horse's head, or engage in a profane wrangle with a reckless driver. The law is the law in London, and the secret of its success is found in the fact that it is enforced without fear or favor. The moment a driver dares to violate the law, he ceases to be a driver. If a pedestrian chooses to pass through a line of moving vehicles he does so at his peril. Nor is your London street traveler a leisurely individual. He is as much in a hurry as his hustling brother in Chicago, but he has learned that there is nothing to be gained by taking desperate chances.

The score therefore stands even. The English railways are atrocious, but the London method of handling street traffic approaches perfection. There are indications that England is about to adopt the best features of the American railway system. They dislike to do it, but there seems no alternative. Are there any indications that we shall discard our obsolete stupid and dangerous street traffic anarchy?

Society "Runs After" the Corbins.

It is astonishing in what demand Maj.-Gen. and Mrs. Corbin are. One woman says the Corbins are the fad of the winter, and physically, no two persons add more to the appearance of an entertainment than do they. "Maj.-Gen. Corbin," said a girl at the Charity Ball, "is my ideal of a military hero. He is simply stunning." The general does cut an impressive figure with his broad shoulders and fine stature. Mrs. Corbin, while not in any sense beautiful, has a charming presence. She has a sweet and refined face and a winning smile. Moreover, she dresses exquisitely. Mrs. Corbin has the knack of fascinating women and she is quite the lion of the more fashionable women's luncheons. The Vanderbilt-Sloane-Webb set is quite devoted to the newcomer and Mrs. Gambrill, Mrs. Charles B. Alexander and Mrs. Edward J. Berwind all have entertained for her. Nor is it because of her husband's lofty position in the army that Mrs. Corbin has been so distinct a success. Official position means nothing to the "right" set. It is almost a drawback. The Corbins are admired for themselves alone.—[New York Press.

Bright's Disease and Diabetes News.

Sacramento, Cal., Feb. 22, 1904.

To Relatives of Those Having Bright's Disease or Diabetes:

Knowing what I do I consider that it would be almost criminal to conceal the knowledge I have as to the curability of Bright's disease and Diabetes when there are so many homes constantly saddened by the presence of these hitherto fatal diseases.

I had Diabetes myself for many years—had exhausted the best of medical talent here without result—it steadily progressed till I heard that there was a cure for it in San Francisco. It looked unreasonable, but I sent for it. In a few weeks I was on the mend, and in six months was in my usual health and strength. I then put an engineer of our road on it. He was broken down with Diabetes and was retired. In a few months he was back to his old position on his engine. Later on, my son, aged 13 years, was discovered by our physicians to be in an extreme condition as the result of Bright's Disease. They felt certain he could not live but a short while. I got the treatment for him, and he is now, to our great delight, strong and vigorous again and at school and growing wonderfully. Many here are taking the treatment. I have told a great many in person, for I know it to be an almost certain cure for Bright's Disease and Diabetes in all stages.

Yours faithfully,
CHARLES A. NEWTON,
Yardmaster S.P.R.R. Co.

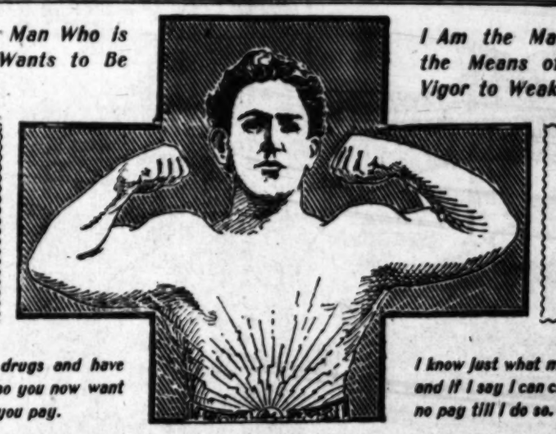
.. Pay When Cured ..

You Are the Man Who is Weak and Wants to Be Strong.

I Am the Man Who Has the Means of Restoring Vigor to Weak Men.

Be A Man — Among Men



Strong Men Rule the World

You have tried drugs and have not been cured, so you now want the cure before you pay.

I know just what my Belt will do, and if I say I can cure you I want no pay till I do so.

TO men who are run down, weak and puny, who have lost the force of vitality, who feel gloomy, despondent and unable to battle with the affairs of life; who have Rheumatism, Back Pains, Weak Stomach and Kidneys and feel generally as if they needed to be made over. If that means you, come to me and if I say that I can cure you I will do so or no pay.

I don't want money that I don't earn. I don't need it, and am not after it. But I am after the dollars that are now going wrong in the quest of health. Look at all these poor wrecks of humanity that are spending all they earn on drugs—dope that is paralyzing their vital organs—that have spent all they have earned for years without gaining a pound of strength for the hundreds of dollars wasted.

That is the money that I am after, because for every dollar I take I can give a thousand per cent. interest and I don't want it at all until I have cured you if you will secure me. I have cured so many cases right here that I can prove my claims to you, but if that proof is not enough I'll give you the names of men right near you—where you are. Is that fair?

Just lately I have received letters of praise from these men:

H. W. Webb, Santa Monica, Cal. He was cured of a back trouble of 12 years' standing.

Owen Orr, Chino, Cal., who says I cured him of Indigestion, Constipation, Nervousness and Lumbago from which he had suffered 15 years.

Wherever you are, I think I can give you the name of a man in your town that I have cured. Just send me your address and let me try. This is my twenty-fourth year in the business of pumping new vim into worn-out humanity and I've got cures in nearly every town on the map.

Come and see me if you can and I'll fix you up; or, if you can't call, write to me and I'll do the same. I've got a nice book on men that I'll send sealed, free, if you inclose this ad.

Varicocele

Have you treated for varicocele with people who claim to cure without your quitting your work? If so, you still have your varicocele. My varicocele was cured while you work. Any reliable specialist can and will show you plenty of successfully cured cases before you treat. We have been curing varicocele in Los Angeles 10 years, and are ready to prove our success by introducing you to hundreds of first-class men who will give you the facts. One week under our treatment makes a permanent cure. You should see some of our cases here who were treated 5 and 10 years ago. We use no knife, you have no pain, your cure is permanent. Our examination is free. Are you going to hand your money over to any man before you see the absolute proof of his success?

Contracted Disorders

Of all the diseases peculiar to men, contracted disorders are the most abused by cut-and-try, hit-and-miss treatments, administered by good friends, druggists, doctors in general practice, and most of the would-be specialists. It is certainly interesting to hear the story of the average patient telling his experiences with the different kinds of so-called treatment he has been "up against." A large majority of our patients come to us with all the original disease and part or all of the combinations resulting from delay and mistreatment. We generally have to cure them after some or all of the following conditions have developed: Chronic discharge, stricture, or all of the chronic bladder troubles, diseased prostate, sores, swelling, etc., besides a patient whose confidence and mind are diseased, through failure and disappointment. Don't trifle with these disorders, go to a doctor who knows how to cure you; it is the cheapest, surest and shortest way out. We have been 21 years in the business.

Vital Decline Can be Cured

Vital decline, commonly called weakness, is the result of a diseased condition which weakens the vital nerve center. This disturbing cause is nearly always found in the prostate gland, which the nerve center is located. When the prostate becomes affected by one or more of several things, such as badly-treated local diseases, indiscretions, excessive varicocele, etc. We published years ago the first information ever given out on prostatic trouble as the cause of nervousness; since that time our theories have been accepted by all the best and keen specialists, and at the same time every pretender specialist copies our advertisements, knowing absolutely nothing of our successful means of relief for men of this trouble. No one but a thorough specialist can succeed in all these conditions. Anybody can advertise but the genuine specialist only can satisfy the patient and give him value received.

Kidney and Bladder Troubles

If you have the slightest suspicion that you have either of these troubles, call and have your urine examined; we will make the analysis free, giving you the exact truth of the results of such analysis. Dr. Harrison & Co. have had phenomenal success in their treatment of these troubles; if there be no organic change in the kidneys we will cure in every instance, if free from serious complications. Bear in mind that kidney and bladder troubles, no matter how significant at first, are always fatal in these particular cases. The adage of "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure," is peculiarly applicable. Immediate care and treatment in kidney and bladder troubles is always urgently demanded. We are physicians of experience, and these troubles are our special line of work. Your existing condition is thoroughly cured by our improved methods of treatment. It costs you nothing for consultation and advice.

Stricture

I can do more for stricture in two days with my improved methods, up-to-date method than could be done in three months with the old, painful sound treatment. I can cure nearly every case in ten days, and by a cure I mean the stricture will never give any further trouble. Remember, my method is entirely free from pain—and is certain in every case.

What Attorney JOHN H. FOLEY, Esq. says: "I have taken more keen enjoyment from reading 'Modern Eloquence' than from any other books in my library. A man is made better, and has his thoughts uplifted by a perusal of this work. It has a mission for good to perform in this world, and Mr. Reed is today receiving the prayers and thanks of a grateful public."

What A. H. NAFTZGER, Esq., President and Manager of the California Fruit Agency says: "I have just read, with great pleasure, the lecture of 'Ian Mac Laren' on 'Scottish Traits.' I have also read the lecture of 'Colonel Watterson' on 'Abraham Lincoln,' which is a bit of genuine eloquence, and especially interesting, since I am a profound admirer of Mr. Lincoln. I am genuinely interested in 'Modern Eloquence,' and intend to keep it close at hand where I can pick it up at any leisure moment and enjoy it."

What Attorney WM. J. VARIEL, Esq. says: "I do not know of any set of books that I have derived greater pleasure from than Reed's 'Modern Eloquence'. I do not see how I could very well part with the books—in fact I would not part with them unless I were assured of being able to immediately replace them."

What Judge D. K. TRASK, of the Superior Court says: "I know of no better work for a private library than Reed's 'Modern Eloquence.'"

Former Editor Philadelphia Times. Author of "Abraham Lincoln and Men of War Times," and the associate of many great men in public life.

"A Great Addition to My Library."

Enclosed find check being payment in full for set of MODERN ELOQUENCE.

A thorough examination of the work suggests four controlling thoughts to me. The first three Volumes, containing After-Dinner Speeches, and the tenth Volume, filled with those rare examples of Repartee and Story, are the most INTERESTING Volumes I have ever read.

The Lectures are the most EDUCATING productions ever offered to the higher class of American citizens.

The Occasional Addresses are priceless from the standpoint of INSPIRATION alone.

The last department, POLITICAL ORATORY, gives the most lucid and comprehensive resume of governmental growth and development that has yet come to my notice, and from a HISTORICAL standpoint alone, is beyond compare.

Interest, education, inspiration and historical relation are the four factors that make MODERN ELOQUENCE the choicest set of books that I possess.

Thanking you, I remain

Yours very truly,

A. K. McClure

MODERN ELOQUENCE was not purchased by the Governors of States, United States Senators and prominent clergymen because it contained matter interesting to men in their calling, but it was purchased by them, as by thousands of others, because it palpitates with life and force, and abounds with beauty in every sentence—because it contains the greatest spoken thought of the Nineteenth Century and affords, as no other work published—inspiring contact with the greatest minds of the greatest century civilization has produced.

What MAYOR M. P. SNYDER says: "'Modern Eloquence' is an imperishable monument to the genuineness of the great men who have modeled the English language in almost perfect form for oral delivery. It is invaluable to the man in public life."

What W. C. PATTERSON, Esq., President of the Los Angeles National Bank, says: "The keen discrimination and excellent judgment displayed in the selections of 'Modern Eloquence' command unqualified admiration. It is one of the most useful publications of this decade."

What Dr. S. M. SPAULDING says: "I have the library of 'Modern Eloquence' edited by the late Thomas B. Reed. I have found it to be what it is claimed, a library of eloquent after-dinner speeches, and lectures by the most finished speakers of modern times.

"To the student it is invaluable to those who are looking forward to filling places being vacated by an All-wise Power it is the incentive to the best efforts to the thoughtful and studious it is elevating and educating. It should be in every library, and as a valued tribute to the finishing work of one of America's greatest statesmen and orators, it should have a place in every home."

A Work Without Precedent, Without Comparison In Literature.

MODERN ELOQUENCE!

No Book Has Appeared In Years So Valuable From Every Standpoint As "Modern Eloquence."

DISCOURSIVE SUBJECTS

This work is the hand-book of the intelligent artisan, the professional man, the judge on the bench, the legislator at his desk and the Executive in his chair.

The disquisition of questions which admit of different conclusions, are treated by men who have been closely identified with each particular movement—men of commanding intellect—men whose possess the faculty of penetration—men whose logic is unerring, perspicuous and complete.

AN ILLUSTRATION:

A letter recently received from Governor Nash, of Ohio, refers to the subject Expansion as being treated from ten distinct viewpoints. The late President McKinley, in his after-dinner speech, The Future of the Philippines, delivered in Boston, outlines the policy of the administration regarding this absorbing question, which is still unsettled, and will no doubt remain so for years to come; President Roosevelt, in True Americanism and Expansion, voices his individuality; Wm. J. Bryan's America's Mission, delivered in Washington, reviews the question historically, and points to the destiny of other nations which have pursued the policy of "criminal aggression"; Assistant District Attorney James M. Beck, in The Democracy of the Mayflower, discusses the question from a historical standpoint also; but reaches different conclusions with equal logic; United States Senator Beveridge, in his beautiful after-dinner speech, The Republic that Never Retreats, therein reflects his views of the question, gleaned from his personal experience and observations in the Philippine Islands; Wu Ting Fang diplomatically reviews the question from the standpoint of the comity of nations: Edward VII., in The Colonies, and Joseph Chamberlain, in Imperial Dominion, maintain generally the English doctrine of colonization.

This is a question of universal interest, and is today unsettled. Opposite views are held by members of the United States Supreme Court. Our colonial experience is new, and its problems are engrossing and interesting, and are bound to become an important issue in our governmental affairs. These volumes were referred to on the above subject in the United States Senate during the discussion of "Civil Government for the Philippine Islands," on April 25th and 26th, last.

One Hundred-Thousand Magazine Readers and more, have learned that in the number of distinguished contributors and in the quality of its contributions, there is no other body of literature at all comparable with Ex-Speaker Reed's literary thesaurus—Modern Eloquence.

More Than Ten Thousand Magazine Readers—those who have purchased sets of the work—have discovered that Modern Eloquence is the finished product of learned and eloquent men—men of lofty ideals and purposes, prophetic insight, moral courage and convictions—men who are profound students of human nature, possessing great breadth of thought and depth of feeling and emotion, patriotic ardor and religious fervor and exultation, perfect art of expression, and the nameless charm that lies in delicate sentiment, quick fancy, keen thought and scintillations of wit and humor. Here also may be found wealth of material, felicitous phrase, happy occasion, mental inspiration from applause, and the word painting art by which the speaker presents to the mind's eye the complete scenery—the living figures of his discourse.

These Subscribers have learned, moreover, that "genius has put its illuminating stamp on every coin, and imagination has lent its glow to every line." Many teachers and college professors have been quick to recognize and take advantage of its literary and historical value, and its importance as a means of instruction in class-room work.

But it remains our pleasant task to disclose to Times subscribers and readers the educational value of this great American classic. When we can show, as we certainly can, that Modern Eloquence stands a beacon light to the Twentieth Century; that it represents the Golden Age of the world's history and will "blaze" the way for those who follow after, to arouse, inspire and lead them on to greater heights, larger humanities and more glorious achievements and victories; that it enables one to command the powers of the strongest, and render weak the opposing forces—then may we hope that every wideawake reader of The Times will hasten to secure a set.

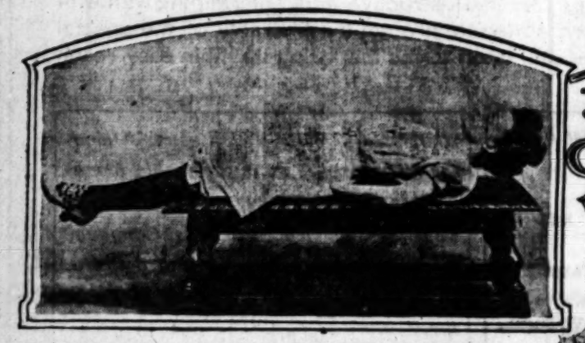
HOW TO BE HEALTHY AND BEAUTIFUL---By Mrs. Symes



Learning to Breathe at A Breathing School.

Lifting Oneself without the Aid of the Hands

A Difficult Pose Made Possible by the Ozone

The Desire to Exercise Comes Naturally

Bending Back.

NINE-TENTHS of all the civilized population of the globe don't breathe properly—don't know how to breathe, in fact—according to the physical culturists.

The deep drawn abdominal breath is being taught by all progressive culture classes and gymnasiums, in connection with other training, but the idea of a special breathing school is a distinctly new one.

Such an institution has just been opened at No. 12 Marble Arch, London, England.

There the nurses and instructors not only teach one to breathe correctly, but, what is even more to the point, provide pure air for one to inhale as well. The place is as unlike any other so-called institute where breathing gymnastics are taught as it is possible to imagine.

There are no exercisers screwed to whitewashed walls, no dumbbells—in fact, nothing that one usually expects to see in an establishment which claims to develop the chest. Instead, one is ushered into a spacious hall, and a footman bows one into a splendidly furnished drawing room.

Art paper adorns the walls. The carpet must be a costly one. There is a little mahogany table here, a lounge settee yonder, while a great carved cabinet looks very imposing in a corner. Palms are placed everywhere—the place, in fact, is a dream of luxury, combined with exquisite taste. Such is the Breathing Cabinet.

No sport and no general gymnastics are practiced in this department, and the proceedings there are taken with a view to bracing the systems of the weak and sickly, to whom every violent form of exercise would do harm.

First of all, the professor seems to take the visitor's "measure" at a glance, asks a few questions on general health, and, according to his diagnosis, prescribes varying forms of treatment.

This done, and chatting reassuringly in the small talk of the drawing room, he proceeds to open a box which shows a mysterious coil under glass. He touches a switch and a slight purring noise is heard at once.

This is an ozone-making machine, the visitor is next informed, and ere another minute has elapsed you commence to inhale—well, you do not quite know what. All at once the air has seemed to become lighter, there is a strong smell of seaweed. Yes, it is undoubtedly briny breezes the little machine is wafting into the room, and as you sniff it in delightedly there are visions of cliffs and surf, and the roar of the traffic in the streets gives it a kind of reality, too, if you close your eyes.

"Now," murmurs the professor, "we will, while the ozone is purifying the air of this apartment, just indulge in a few simple bodily exercises to the accompaniment of breathing from the top of the lungs, the centre of them, and the bottom of them."

So it comes about that the professor sets the example and the patient imitates him. It is all so easy—no exertion.

The desire to exercise comes naturally and the patient finds herself indulging in strenuous poses without fatigue.

Five minutes of this in a room which is supplied with a percentage of oxygen and ozone, rendering it equal to the finest mountain or sea air, and one gets quite an appetite.

Small wonder is it that people who can afford to pay well for the privilege visit the establishment regularly, and that a glance at the visitors' book reveals the names of many people well known in society.

According to the nature of his patient's complaint the professor varies an ozone atmosphere with those of eucalyptus and pine forests. The institute is entirely devoted to the weak and ailing; no general classes are held, and only single and individual modified treatments are given.

Realizing that it is not everybody who can afford the luxury of having sea breezes turned on at will in London, the professor does not mind letting all girls know how they can obtain pretty shoulders, plump necks and sound [illegible] gratis, and for nothing. It [illegible] minutes of your time every [illegible]

Just open the bedroom [illegible] he says, drop your hands at [illegible] close your mouth, take in a [illegible] breath. Hold your breath—[illegible] slowly. Then let the [illegible] slowly. Say "B-l-o-o-o-w" [illegible] pel the breath. Repeat the [illegible] twenty times; then dress and [illegible] breakfast, and you will be [illegible] what a big one you will eat.

MRS. HENRY SYMES' RECIPES AND TALKS ON HEALTH AND BEAU

PALE LIPS.

Doris—No girl of eighteen should use artificial coloring on her cheeks or lips. These things are excusable in women of a certain age who have lost their fresh coloring through ill-health or anxiety, but in a young girl they are pathetic and deplorable.

Try some natural methods of bringing a deeper tint to the lips. Practice deep breathing, get plenty of fresh air and exercise and eat only nourishing, wholesome foods. The color resulting from hygiene will be far prettier and more becoming at your age than that given by any salve.

Mrs. H. H.—In your place I would not be alarmed over the increase in flesh. This is most natural under the circumstances. It will in all probability not be lasting.

You might try walking and light gymnastics. These are harmless remedies, but it would certainly be very unwise to diet or use any patent preparation.

FOR EVA, ANXIOUS AND R. S. T.

Eva—You describe a case of distended blood vessels, or very small ruptured vessels, which can only be treated by a skillful surgical operation. Before placing yourself in the hands of a specialist, be careful to assure yourself that he is of the very highest repute, as a great deal of harm might be done by an ignorant or incompetent person. This is intended also for Anxious and R. S. T.

A SALLOW COMPLEXION.

Mrs. J. G. K.—Yellow skin always indicates a torpid liver. You cannot hope to overcome it by merely cosmetic treatment. Get your liver into good condition and your sallow complexion will undoubtedly improve. Suggestions for the treatment of enlarged pores are given in answer to another correspondent.

USE OF THE BRUSH.

I am very much concerned about my complexion. My skin is tough looking and coarse shriveled, and I am afraid to use any of the creams, as I have a great tendency to [illegible] on the face. I have always been complimented upon my good complexion, but I am afraid it is going. Will you kindly send me a good whitening and softening recipe for the face, and also tell me how to use the almond paste brush. I see from your columns that the proper use of the face brush will prevent the coarsening from taking place. Is this correct?

And after all, if I can have the hair removed by the electric needle, and it will be permanent, and where it can be done.

I give you formulas for lotion which is both whitening and softening. Yes, if you use the face scrubbing brush faithfully at least once in every twenty-four hours there will be no danger of increasing the growth of hair.

Electrolysis at the hands of an experienced operator will permanently remove superfluous hair. I regret very much that the rules of this department prevent me from giving the names of specialists.

HOW TO USE THE CAMEL'S HAIR FACE SCRUBBING BRUSH.

Immerse the brush in water as hot as can be pleasantly borne. Soap it well, just as you would if you were about to use it for your hands. Scrub the face thoroughly, taking especial care of the places that most require cleansing. Rinse the face with cooler clean water, so as to get all the soap out of the pores. Dry carefully and apply a cream or toilet balsam; any good emollient will answer.

DEPILATORY.

Sulphydrate of soda, 100 grains.
Chalk, 200 grains.

Make into a thin paste with water and apply to the hairy part, and let it remain a few moments and then scrape it off with a pumice stone. The effect of the depilatory is to destroy the hair, which comes off when scraped.

Another good depilatory is made as follows:

DEPILATORY POWDER.

Sulphide of soda, 100 grains.
Slaked lime, 50 grams.
Starch, 20 grains.
Lime water, 4 fluid drams.

Apply as the preceding.

Barium sulphide is also used as a paste for depilatories.

The standard formula is:

Barium sulphide, 30 grains.
Powdered chalk, 60 grains.

Mix with water. The barium sulphide must be absolutely dry to be effective when it is mixed with the chalk. Enough water should be added afterward to make a thin paste.

Sulphide of strontium makes also an efficient depilatory.

It is made as follows:

Sulphide of strontium, 2 drams.
Oxide of zinc, 2 drams.
Powdered starch, 2 drams.

Mix thoroughly and keep dry in well-corked bottles until wanted for use. Take enough to make a paste and add warm water to it until the proper consistency is secured. Spread over the hairy surface and allow it to remain for from one to five minutes, according to the nature of the growth and the susceptibility of the skin. It should be removed, as in every case with a depilatory, when the sensation of burning is produced.

Liquid depilatories, so far as I have experimented with them, are unsatisfactory. Frequently they seem to be all right when purchased, but after standing for days they deposit crystals. I have never seen a depilatory that was effective after remaining in solution. The cost of a good depilatory is from $1.50 to $2.

Too long contact with the skin should be avoided in using depilatories, and immediately after the hair has been removed the denuded surface should be gently washed with warm water and a cold cream or a bland oil applied to prevent irritation.

I wish the many readers who have written me concerning depilatories would consider this an answer to each one individually.

FOUR UNSIGHTLY BLEMISHES.

I am an interested reader of your page and long for the advice you so cheerfully give to others.

The history of my case is too long to relate, but after many years of suffering with deep-seated pustular formations upon the face, it is scarred and pitted by the frequent use of the surgeon's lance. The skin is sensitive and presents an oily appearance with blackheads, and broken-down tissues, where had been pustules that were lanced, the skin never receiving naturally its congested condition in different places on the face. Can the scars be made to absorb and fade away? The various lotions used caused wild hairs to grow on the chin.

You see I have four unsightly blemishes, scars, blackheads and enlarged pores, oily skin and wild hairs to spoil not only my face, but my happiness and peace of mind. The pustules have ceased to form since a more rigid observance of diet and hygiene. My anxiety now is to make the skin look better, more fine in texture and smooth.

I have used the complexion brush with soap and hot water with good effect, except leaving a sensitiveness of the skin the next day.

What course can I pursue for treatment, and what daily care ought I to give the face to perfect a cure and produce a skin of fine texture? Would the roller massage be of benefit? ANXIETY.

You have already taken the first and most important steps toward improving the texture of the skin. Scrupulous cleanliness, wholesome food, exercise and fresh air will do more for the complexion than any applications. Do not permit yourself to be discouraged if benefits are not immediately apparent. It would not be reasonable to suppose that blemishes resulting from years of carelessness could be banished in a few weeks or months.

The scars left by the pustules, like those from wounds or burns, take long to fade away. No doubt they will become less noticeable with the general improvement of the skin. For the present you should devote your energies to overcoming the other difficulties.

Read over the suggestions for the cure of blackheads and enlarged pores given on this page. Give the simpler treatment for blackheads a trial before using the green soap.

If the brush irritates your face suspend the scrubbing process for several days; then use the brush only once every third day. Usually the brush does not irritate, but whenever it does the subject should get into the habit of scrubbing the face by degrees.

I am inclined to think it is the soap you are using, not the brush, which causes sensitiveness the following day. Have you been very particular in the selection of a brand? A pure, bland soap is needed for the face.

Electrolysis and X-rays are the only methods of removing hair permanently from the face. The electrical treatment is not expensive, and at the hands of an expert would surely be successful. If you decide to employ this method ask your physician for the name of some competent operator.

I give you formula for a lotion which will also benefit your skin.

OLD-FASHIONED SKIN LOTION.

Spermaceti, 15 grains; white soap, in powder, ½ dram; white wax (pulverized), ½ dram; almond oil (sweet), ½ dram; fordan almonds, 4 ounces; pure alcohol, 2 ounces; distilled water, 1 ounces; attar of roses, 3 drops; oil of neroli, 3 drops; essence of white rose, ½ dram; essence of jasmine, ½ dram.

Blanch the almonds and beat them into a smooth paste, adding some water gradually to form a thin cream. Melt the wax, spermaceti and almond oil together, and rub this add the soap, previously rubbed down with one-half ounce of water. To this add, in small quantities, the remainder of the water, assiduously stirring. Then add the strained almond cream and finally the alcohol and the perfume.

A little of this milk may be rubbed into the skin several times during the day. The effect is permanently beneficial.

THE PHYSICIAN'S REMEDY ONCE MORE.

Will you please give me the "Physician's" recipe for gray hair, to restore natural color, etc? I see in a recent paper you claim white hair cannot be changed to natural color, which is right. I am a young man 41 years old. Around my temples my hair is very gray (or white). If the above is good I would like to try it.

Many correspondents have written me that they have used this remedy with wonderful success. Personally I do not care to endorse it, because it contains sugar of lead. I repeat the formula since you ask for it, but repeat also my warning—it would be dangerous where there was any irritation or abrasion of the scalp.

TO RESTORE THE NATURAL COLOR OF THE HAIR.

(A physician's prescription.)

Sugar lead, ½ ounce; lac sulphur, ½ ounce; essence of bergamot, ½ ounce; alcohol, ½ pint; glycerine, 1 ounce; tincture of cantharides, ½ ounce; ammonia, ½ ounce.

Mix all in one pint of soft water. Apply to the roots of the hair, which must be clean.

TO APPLY THE LIQUID POWDER.

READER.—Are you sure that you followed the instructions carefully in applying the liquid white? It will not spot or streak the face if the bottle is well shaken and the liquid immediately wiped off before it has a chance to dry.

It may be that it has been prepared without sufficient rosewater. Try the application once more, and if the liquid still spots the face add more rosewater. If the operation is performed absolutely according to instructions this whitener is wholly imperceptible. I know of its use in hundreds of cases, and there has never been any question as to the result.

FRAGRANT SACHET POWDER.

MRS. K. F.—Try this formula for sachet powder:

VIOLET SACHET POWDER.

Powdered orris, 1 pound; powdered bergamot peel, ¼ ounce; powdered acacia, ¼ ounce; musk, 20 grains.

Mix thoroughly. Bottle for ten days, when it is ready for use.

GOOD FORMULAS FOR CREAM.

MRS. B.—Here are formulas for two creams, either one of which may be used in massaging the bust:

MASSAGE CREAM.

Lanolin, 2½ ounces; spermaceti, ¾ ounce; white vaseline, 2½ ounces; cocoanut oil, 2 ounces; sweet almond oil, 2 ounces; tincture of benzoin, ½ dram.

Melt the first five ingredients together, heat until the mass concretes, adding the benzoin drop by drop, during this process.

Extract of violet or any perfume may be added if agreeable.

VENUS CREAM.

(A Skin Food.)

Spermaceti (pure), ¼ ounce; white wax (pure), ¼ ounce; almond oil, ¼ pound; butter of cocoa, ¼ pound; lanolin, 2 ounces.

Melt and stir in one dram of balsam of Peru. After settling, pour off the clear portion, add two fluid drams of orange flower water and stir briskly until it concretes.

Correct Movements in Facial Massage

DOZENS of letters have been received by the department lately asking for the correct movements in facial massage. These inquiries are principally from new subscribers who have missed the many previous talks on this topic in these columns.

For the benefit of the newcomers I print once again the desired instructions, and I trust that every woman who has put the query how she may remove wrinkles from her face to restore the rounded contour to her cheeks will consider herself answered herewith.

Facial massage may have various effects. It may be so administered that, instead of making a face look round and filling up the hollows in the cheeks, it will produce the very opposite effect, and will make the face look drawn and haggard.

Don't forget that massage will, if given too vigorously or for too long a time, have the effect of wasting the tissues. Flesh is reduced by friction, which wastes and burns out the carbon; the body's fuse is fat.

In giving massage for beautifying the operator should know how to leave off.

The object of massage is to stimulate the circulation of the blood and invigorate the muscles, which can only be nourished in this way.

Before giving massage the operator should carefully wash the hands and dry them. To make the first movement grasp the principal cheek muscles firmly with the fingers and make a wheel-like movement.

Support the fingers by pressing the thumbs against the subject's head just back of the ears.

The second movement is made for the purpose of rounding cheeks, as well as obliterating the wrinkles at the corners of the eyes. Same rotary motion. A kneading movement may also be given.

The movement for the drooping lines at the corner of the mouth, which so many people acquire, is made by manipulating the muscles of the nose with the fingers. Remember that the object is always to lift up, not to pull down. Upward curves are youthful, and youthful faces should have no need of massage.

The operator should dip her finger occasionally in a good skin food. The skin will receive a certain amount of nourishment from the surface, and a skin food, as the name implies, supplies this nutrition. More than enough is a waste and apt to encourage a morbid growth of hair.

Enough skin food is the amount the cuticle will absorb in an hour or so. A good skin food, properly applied, will not encourage or create a growth of hair.

Unfortunately, many of the preparations on the market have a base of vaseline, and, as most women know, vaseline is a hair-grower of no small capacity.

Massage treatments of twenty minutes a day are better than treatments once or twice a week prolonged for half an hour.

Unless one has given the method a trial, one is inclined to smile at the saying that the shape of the nose may be changed by manipulation with the thumb and forefinger.

The operation is slow and is more successful in extreme youth than later, but I can bear witness to the fact that pug noses caught in time can be marvelously improved and made over by manipulation once or twice a day. Treat the nose precisely as though it were a stubborn piece of dough you were trying to mould into shape.

TREATMENT FOR WRINKLES.

D. C. L.—I regret that the rules of the department prevent my sending you the name of a specialist. Before undergoing an operation for the wrinkles why not try the simple treatment suggested elsewhere on this page.

COST OF REMEDY.

EUGENIA.—I do not know the exact cost of the remedy. Any reliable druggist would be able to tell you the price.

READER.—I repeat with pleasure the formula for which you ask.

BENZOIN CREAM JELLY.

Gum tragacanth, white, 120 grains; water, 14 ounces; glycerine, 1 ounce; tincture of benzoin, 2 drams; borax powder, 120 grains; white rose extract, 4 drams.

Macerate the tragacanth in the water until perfectly soft, and dissolve the borax in the glycerine. Mix the two solutions, add the tincture and strain with expression through muslin.

DANDRUFF AND FALLING HAIR.

J. B. L.—Scalp massage is always the best remedy for falling hair. If you cannot afford the services of a professional give yourself treatment at home. The principal movements have been repeatedly described on this page. You will find below formula for a shampoo mixture, which, if used faithfully once a week, will cleanse the scalp of dandruff. The tonic should be applied once every twenty-four hours.

EGG SHAMPOO—DANDRUFF CURE.

Yolk of 1 egg; 1 pint hot rain water; spirits of rosemary, 1 ounce. Beat the mixture thoroughly and use it warm. Rub it well into the scalp and rinse with several clear waters.

TONIC FOR THE SCALP.

Aromatic vinegar, 4 drams; glycerine, 2 drams; tincture of nux vomica, 2½ drams; tincture of cantharides, 2 drams; rosewater, 4 drams.

Use every night, rubbing it well into the scalp with a small sponge.

INQUIRY FOR THE FAMOUS PRESCRIPTION.

One of your notices in your paper stated that some one had used the doctor's prescription for hair restorer and found it so beneficial. You also stated that you had heard from many others who were delighted with the same. Would you be kind enough to publish it again for the benefit of one of your readers? F. E. M.

The prescription has been repeated since your letter was received. No doubt you have taken advantage of it.

DANDRUFF REMEDY.

Kindly advise me through your valuable columns about my skin. I am troubled with small pimples. They do not come to a head, but when I squeeze them something white comes out like small worms, especially on the nose; also my skin is oily. If you think the camel's-hair brush will be good for it, please tell me the price of it and where to get the same. Also, will you tell me what to use for my hair? The scalp is covered with fine dandruff.

COUSIN CLARA.

Yes, the complexion brush would be excellent for your skin. You can procure the correct brush from any reputable establishment in a large city at a cost of about one dollar.

You will find the remedy for whiteheads given in answer to "Katharine." Try this remedy for the dandruff.

TO REMOVE DANDRUFF.

Tincture of cantharides, 1 ounce; liquid ammonia, 1 dram; eau de cologne, 6 ounces; oil thyme, ½ dram; rosemary oil, ½ dram.

Mix all together with six ounces of rosewater. Rub into scalp thoroughly with this preparation until no further evidence of dandruff is noticed.

THREE FORMULAS FOR DYES.

I would like you to extend the helpfulness of your department to my case, and tell me a good dye for black hair—a dye that I shall be the least likely to use. Also, will you add the recipe for making walnut hair stain?

I give you the best formula for hair dye that I know; still, I cannot say how successful you will find it. It is only in exceptional cases that these home-made prescriptions give perfect satisfaction.

The best plan always is to go to a first-class hair dresser, allow him to select the proper stain and make the first application.

DYE FOR HAIR.

Pyrogallic acid, ¼ ounce; distilled water (hot), 1½ ounces. Dissolve, and when the solution has cooled add gradually rectified spirit, ¼ fluid ounce.

The above is full strength and will make the hair almost black. Diluted with water, it will stain the hair from dark to light brown.

Dyes should never be applied when there is any irritation or abrasion of the scalp.

WALNUT STAIN FOR THE HAIR.

Four ounces of walnut skins, beaten to a pulp, to which is added pure alcohol, 12 ounces.

Let stand eight days and drain. Then apply as any other dye.

GREEN WALNUT STAIN.

Green walnut shells, 2 ounces; alum, ¼ ounce; pure chloride of ammonia, ¼ ounce.

Heat together in a water bath until the water has been completely expelled, then express, filter and perfume.

A CURE FOR WHITEHEADS.

KATHARINE.—I repeat with pleasure the formula for whiteheads. Keep your skin thoroughly cleansed by the use of camel's-hair face brush, hot water and a pure, bland soap. Read over carefully the hints on hygienic living given last week in answer to another correspondent. This is intended also for "M. R. M."

WHITE HEADS (ACNE MOLLUSCUM).

Open each seed acne with the point of a fine cambric needle. The hardened mass must be pressed or pricked out. The empty sack of the gland should then be bathed with a little violet vinegar and water, or with a very weak solution of carbolic acid and water. Sterilize the needle before using it by dipping it into boiling water.

FOR "ANXIOUS MOTHER" AND OTHERS—This is the best method I know to correct this trouble:

CURE FOR PARASITES.

Get a cake of bichloride of mercury soap (the imported is the best) and cut it into halves and shave one-half into fine bits. Dissolve it in boiling water. You may set the mixture on the stove over a gentle heat if you choose. You should have water to form a jellylike mixture when cold. To use, first wet the hair thoroughly with clear, warm water, then rub the soap mixture into the hair, taking care that every particle of the scalp is thoroughly saturated with the soap mixture. Give the head a good shampoo with this mixture and rinse several times.

If you follow these directions carefully the result will be successful.

MRS. E. J. H.—This, I think, is the formula to which you refer. Any desired perfume might be added:

WHEN PIMPLES FOLLOW BLACKHEADS.

Cure for Confluent Acne—(Monin).

Apply the following mixture to the afflicted parts morning and night:

Glycerine, 40 grams; oxide of zinc, 5 grams; soap tincture, 10 grams; potassa alum, 2 grams. Mix.

For internal treatment in connection with the above the patient should take each morning before breakfast one tablespoonful of a mixture composed of equal parts of pure glycerine and castor oil.

TO REDUCE THE AVOIRDUPOIS.

In response to "A. C." "Anxious" and several other correspondents, these rules appear once more:

RULES FOR THE REDUCTION OF FLESH.

Avoid all starchy and sweetened food, all cereals, vegetables containing sugar or starch, such as peas, beans, corn, potatoes, etc. Have your bread toasted, sprinkle it with salt instead of butter. Milk, I regret to say, if it be pure and good, is fattening. Skimmed milk may be drank. Hot water is an excellent substitute for other liquids. Add a little of the juice of limes or lemons to it, if you choose. Limit your sleeping hours to seven at the outside. No naps. You must take exercise.

If you cannot walk at least five miles a day, and do not wheel, go to one of the institutions where mechanical massage is given. Several of my correspondents report excellent results from this method of getting the vigorous exercise they require. The system is thoroughly wholesome and not expensive, in reducing flesh the one fact to recollect is that fat is carbo—oxygen destroys or burns out carbon. You must consume the carbon by the oxygen you take through your lungs. The more exercise the more oxygen and consequent destruction of fat by the one healthful method of curing obesity.

The more starch and sugar you eat, the more carbon to burn away.

CONSTANT READER—Yes, the pomade is perfectly harmless. The suggestions given above are intended for your benefit, as well as that of others.

DARK CIRCLES UNDER THE EYES.

D.—There is always, in my opinion, some internal cause for the black circles under the eyes. The tendency is sometimes hereditary, but dark lines are usually due to some congestion of the veins of the part, and are rarely, if ever, found excepting under one or more of the following circumstances:

Where the subject is anaemic, and there is an impairment of the chemical constitution of the blood, or when the system is being drained as it would be in prolonged study, lack of sleep or dissipation of any description. The external treatment is sometimes effective temporarily, but cannot be permanent while the cause exists.

LOCAL TREATMENT.

Bathe frequently with cold water and use friction. A little turpentine liniment or weak ammonia, one part of diluted ammonia to four of water, may be rubbed into the skin daily (once), but great care must be taken that it does not reach the eye proper.

TREATMENT FOR ENLARGED PORES.

NEWSBOY—Use of the complexion brush is the best method of restoring enlarged pores to a normal condition. A correct hair brush may be obtained from any reputable dealer in cosmetics for about one dollar.

Use also the lotion for which I give you formula.

ENLARGED PORES.

It takes a long time to cure enlarged pores, and the only way I know of is by the use of the scrubbing brush and a pure hygienic soap. By this process the pores, which have become enlarged by the clogged secretion, are kept free, and gradually they will contract and become normal in size. I know of thousands of cures effected in this manner.

HOW TO USE THE CAMEL'S HAIR FACE SCRUBBING BRUSH.

Immerse the brush in water as hot as can be pleasantly borne. Soap it well, just as you would if you were about to use it for your hands. Scrub the face thoroughly, taking especial care of the places that most require the cleansing. Rinse the face with cooler clean water, so as to get all the soap out of the pores. Dry carefully, apply a cream or toilet balsam; any good emollient will answer.

LOTION FOR ENLARGED PORES.

Boric acid, 1 dram; distilled water, 4 ounces. Apply with a piece of [illegible] or a bit of absorbent cotton.

A COMMON AILMENT.

WILLIE—I think it very doubtful if anything can be done for a case of long standing as yours. If the skin of the scalp shines or glistens the case is hopeless. I give you formula for a remedy which you may try if the skin is not smooth.

Recipes for a number of [illegible] and massage creams are published each week in the department. Any [illegible] druggist will be able to prepare them for you.

A good complexion brush may be purchased from a reputable [illegible] in any large city at a cost of about a dollar. The rules of the department will vent my giving you the name of a proprietary article.

BALDNESS.

Fluid extract of pilocarpus, 1 ounce; liniment, 2 ounces.

Rub thoroughly into the scalp each morning.

CONSTANT READER—This [illegible] is the formula to which you refer:

LOTION FOR OILY, DAMP SKIN.

For greasy, moist hair the following excellent drying lotion. It tends to produce a beautiful golden auburn shade.

Powdered bicarbonate of soda, 1 ounce; soda (also powdered), ½ ounce; eau de cologne, 1 fluid ounce; alcohol, 2 ounces; tincture of cochineal, 2 drams; distilled water, 12 ounces.

Mix and agitate until solution is complete.

FALLING HAIR AFTER FEVER.

Mrs. E. S.—Falling of the hair is an invariable result of illness which is of a fever extending over a number of days.

The best treatment always in such cases is scalp massage with a [illegible] you cannot engage the services of a hairdresser, you can perform a very satisfactory massage on your own head. Press the fingers firmly into the roots of the scalp, beginning at the forehead and making a little wheeling motion from front to back of head. Repeat every part of the skull. Then make an up-and-down shuttle-like motion. Repeat this until you have worked diligently at work on the scalp for five minutes or half an hour. In a short time the hair will cease to fall.

Do not worry about the [illegible] your scalp is restored to its normal healthy condition, the proper shade will surely return.

Have your eyebrows dyed by a good operator. It can be done so that no one could possibly detect the artificial coloring, and the process takes only a few minutes. I do not know of any preparation for darkening the eyebrows except the regular eyebrow pencils for sale at the toilet counters, and correspondents who have written me that it is neither reliable nor satisfactory, as it irritates the eyes and soils everything with which it comes in contact.

The Vaucaire remedy above mentioned is excellent in your case. Try that, and massage also in connection.

Treatment for wrinkles is given elsewhere on this page.

SHAMPOO.

Potassium carbonate, 1 ounce; water, 16 ounces; tincture of quillaia, 2 drams; bay rum, 4 ounces; alcohol, 4 ounces; water, 1 ounces.

Dissolve the potassium carbonate in the water and add the remaining ingredients. Rub well into the roots. Rinse in several waters. Then dry carefully.

TONIC FOR THE SCALP.

Aromatic vinegar, 4 drams; tincture of nux vomica, 2½ drams; tincture of cantharides, 2 drams; rosewater, 4 drams.

Use every night, rubbing it well into the scalp with a small sponge.

DYE PRODUCED ECZEMA.

Mrs. K. M.—If the first dye produced eczema your scalp is evidently in a condition to stand the action of [illegible] acids. I should advise you to consult the physician's remedy you have made dye. Instead, go to a reputable hair dresser, have him examine the situation and select the proper dye.

BALDNESS.

Fluid extract of pilocarpine, 1 ounce; soap liniment, 2 ounces.
Rub thoroughly into the scalp night and morning.

CONSTANT READER—This, I think, is the formula to which you refer:

LOTION FOR OILY, DAMP HAIR.

For greasy, moist hair the following is an excellent drying lotion. If used daily it tends to produce a crispy condition and an auburn shade.

Powdered bicarbonate of soda, borate of soda (also powdered), ¼ ounce of each; eau de cologne, 1 fluid ounce; alcohol, 1 fluid ounce; tincture of cochineal, ½ fluid ounce; distilled water, 14 ounces.
Mix and agitate until solution is complete.

FALLING HAIR AFTER FEVER.

Mrs. E. S.—Falling of the hair is an invariable result of illness where there is fever extending over a number of days.
The best treatment always in such cases is scalp massage with a brush. If you cannot engage the services of a hairdresser, you can perform a very fair factory massage on your own head.
Press the fingers firmly into the skin of the scalp, beginning at the temples and making a little wheel-like movement from front to back of head and repeating every part of the skull. Then make an up-and-down shuttle-like movement.
Repeat this until you have been constantly at work on the scalp for two or five minutes or half an hour. In a short time the hair will cease falling.
Do not worry about the color. When your scalp is restored to its normal healthy condition, the pretty auburn shade will surely return.
Have your eyebrows dyed by a skilful operator. It can be done so that no one could possibly detect the artificial coloring, and the process takes only a few minutes. I do not know of any preparation for darkening the eyebrows at home, except the regular eyebrow pencil. Lazard, and correspondents who have asked this write me that it is neither desirable nor satisfactory, as it rubs off and soils everything with which it comes in contact.
The Vaucaire remedy should be excellent in your case. Try deep breathing and massage also in connection with it.
Treatment for wrinkles is given elsewhere on this page.

SHAMPOO.

Potassium carbonate, 1 ounce; soft water, 16 ounces; tincture of cabbage, 2 drams; bay rum, 4 ounces; alcohol, 4 ounces; water, 6 ounces.
Dissolve the potassium carbonate in the water and add the remaining ingredients.
Rub well into the roots. Rinse thoroughly in several waters. Then dry carefully.

TONIC FOR THE SCALP.

Aromatic vinegar, 4 drams; glycerine, 4
drams; tincture of nux vomica, 2 drams; tincture of cantharides, 2 drams; water,
6 drams.
Use every night, rubbing it well into the scalp with a small sponge.

DYE PRODUCED ECZEMA.

Mrs. K. M.—If the first dye produced eczema your scalp is evidently in a condition to stand the action of no dye acids. I should advise you to consult the physician's remedy or any preparation made dye. Instead, go to a good hair dresser, have him make an examination and select the proper shade.

AMERICAN HEIRESS MARKET IN BERLIN.

Arrangements for Supplying Penniless European Aristocrats With Rich Wives—Agents in America Who Gather Information.

BY GEORGE WEISS.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE TO THE TIMES.]

BERLIN, Feb. 10.—It seems that the invasion of America by Princes, Counts, Viscounts, Barons, and lords of all degrees, from all the courts of Europe for the purpose of wedding American heiresses takes place in accordance with well-known laws of trade. Europe suffers from an overproduction of Aristocrats, and the American commercial men study foreign markets when they cannot find sufficient business at home, so the sons of noble houses are forced to look westward to find a sphere where they can successfully operate.

Probably few people on the American side of the Atlantic Ocean are aware of the vast numbers of noblemen of all ranks to be found in Europe. Unlike the titles of peers in England, which only descend from father to eldest son, while younger sons and their children become decluded into commoners, the titles and dignities of continental noblemen are inherited by all their sons, however many they may have. The result is that the number of Princes, Counts, Barons and so forth is being continually multiplied, for the comparatively small proportion of aristocratic families which become extinct do not more the balance upset by the birth of many sons to other families. One prince may be the father of a dozen other Princes, who in their turn, may become the fathers of 144 more little princes, who in due course may become the fathers of a thousand more princes. This is, of course, an extreme case, but it well illustrates the possibilities of the system.

A glance at the Gotha Almanac conveys an an approximate idea of the numerical strength of the nobility of Europe. No less than 3250 pages of this wonderful book are crammed with the names of Princes, Counts, Barons, and Aristocrats of other degrees, printed in Gothaian type. The Almanach de Gotha, however, is only a register of the nobility of Germany, Austria, and Hungary, taking practically no account of the minor aristocracy of Russia, Sweden, Denmark, France, Spain, Italy, and other countries, in all of which all the sons of noblemen inherit their fathers' rank and titles. A minimum estimate places the number of noblemen in Europe at 100,000, while one eminent writer on genealogies states that he is convinced there are fully half a million of legitimate Aristocrats in continental Europe, excluding England.

One of the natural results of the European system is that the younger sons of noblemen inherit titles without money to maintain the correspondent style of living. Many of them enter the armies of Europe, where they often conspicuous for their military incapacity, others obtain positions in various departments of state work, while others, again, resort to all sorts of queer methods of earning a living. One of the favorite resources of European noblemen with but no money is the conclusion of a successful matrimonial alliance with the daughter of an American millionaire.

AN ORGANIZED INDUSTRY.

The demand of impecunious European noblemen for wealthy American wives has brought into existence a new industry, consisting in the supply of information to ambitious aristocrats regarding the number and position of marriageable heiresses in the American market. An organization known as the American Matrimonial Agency, which was formed some time ago, is doing a flourishing business in more than one European country. The headquarters are here in Berlin, and branches exist in Vienna, Budapest, Prague, Munich, Stuttgart, Wiesbaden, Darmstadt, Dresden, Rome, Milan, Madrid, Paris, Brussels, Copenhagen, and many other European cities.

In America, the organization employs agents in every important city and in every State. These agents are entrusted with the task of sending the names of marriageable American heiresses to headquarters in Berlin, and the managers of the concern stipulate that the information supplied shall be absolutely trustworthy. The agents in America are required to furnish not only the names of such heiresses, but also their ages, principal characteristics, features of personal appearance, and minute details of their past histories. Such details must include exact height, waist measurement, size of gloves worn, size of shoes worn, color of hair, shape and color of eyes, formation of nose, build of mouth and chin, and characteristics of figure, as a whole. Further particulars of whims and temper, literary and artistic tastes, style and manners must be procured and forwarded to Berlin, for noblemen, even when penniless, have fastidious tastes, and would like their brides to possess personal charm as well as money.

In addition to these personal details, reliable information must be given regarding the father's exact wealth, how he has invested his fortune, whether he is in danger of losing it by speculation, and other kindred points. Information must also be supplied showing whether the daughter in question is sure of inheriting a fortune, or whether any combination of circumstances, such as a second marriage contracted by her father, might deprive her of a portion or of the whole of her expected inheritance. The story of her father's ancestry and his past life, as well as the ancestry and past life of her mother, must be dug up to make sure that prohibitive family scandals do not diminish the matrimonial value of the young lady.

SECRET INFORMATION BUREAU.

It is obvious that great difficulties stand in the way of obtaining minute details of this kind, and that the agents employed for the purpose must operate with intelligence, stealth, thoroughness and unbounded discretion. The matrimonial agency maintains a regular army of spies in America to procure information about American heiresses and their circumstances for the benefit of penniless noblemen in Europe. Women are almost invariably employed to procure all the personal details required, which they are able to accomplish with more skill and finesse than male detectives can command.

Women engaged for this work are divided into two classes; society women and lower class women. The first class consists of girls or married women who have access to fashionable society, but lack the means to live up to the style maintained by their wealthy friends. Women of this class are often glad to earn liberal fees by doing detective work, especially as it generally consists in finding out particulars of girls whose wealth they covet and whose social position they envy, so that they feel no moral scruples about acting as spies for foreign adventurers. The other class consists of women who secure employment as domestic servants as a means of procuring confidential information about the interior of households and details of family secrets. It often happens that while one society woman is gathering information for the matrimonial agency through social intercourse with the heiress, her ally is serving as lady's maid to the heiress herself, or as a servant in the heiress's home. Between them they are able to supply their employer with all the facts which he requires.

On the other hand, men are employed to find out the financial and commercial position of the father, his speculations, prospects, and projects. Sometimes young men at the clubs are found who are willing to earn money by procuring particulars of this kind, and sometimes the matrimonial agency is able to tap clerks in the victim's own offices, though this does not often occur. The whole system or espionage in America is under the supervision of a detective-in-chief residing in New York, who draws a princely salary for efficiently directing the enterprise. It is not permitted to reveal his identity beyond saying that he is of German nationality.

The information, when collected, is sent to headquarters in Berlin, where it is sorted out and classified in a register of American heiresses. The other branch of the matrimonial agency's work consists in distributing particulars to noblemen likely to be in want of wealthy wives. The clients of the concern, like its spies, are divided into two classes. Some aristocrats apply openly to the agency, which carries on its business under an innocent disguise, stating frankly the nature of their matrimonial needs.

INTRODUCTIONS ARRANGED.

At the present moment the office of the agency in Berlin is in possession of letters inquiring about American heiresses from three princes, seven counts, nineteen barons, two viscounts, one marquis, and a dozen miscellaneous aristocrats. Before any information is supplied to any client, he is required to pay a handsome registration fee and to sign a legal document promising that if he is able to contract a suitable marriage through the agency he will pay a certain percentage of his bride's dowry by way of remuneration. The agency then allows him to inspect the register of heiresses, and if one of the rich girls meets his approval, he is advised to proceed to America to pay court to her.

The agency undertakes to arrange his introduction into the circles of society in which the lady in question moves in America. The agency supports his efforts by circulating in the neighborhood of the prospective bride's home stories of his high rank, his wonderful ancestry, the absolute purity of his blue blood, and the unblemished record of his family, which as likely as not has consisted of reprobates for ages past. The rest depends on the aristocrat himself, and if his wooing is successful, the agency receives a fee often running into many thousands of dollars. In one match arranged through its machinations, the agency pocketed a fee of $100,000, and in another case, a fee of $60,000 was paid.

There are some noblemen, however,

COUNT KERSSENBROCK,
An aristocrat employed as an insurance agent, who is on the Berlin list of applicants for a rich American girl.

who will not apply to the agency, but who have to be approached cautiously. The European agents of the concern have instructions to keep a lookout for all the penniless aristocrats in their district, and to keep the central office informed regarding them. When any such aristocrat is in financial straits, a gentlemanly-looking representative of the agency visits him and discreetly suggests that a good marriage would be a simple solution of all his difficulties. Sometimes the emissary of the matrimonial agency is ejected from the house without further ceremony—he must be prepared for this emergency and take it with a smiling face—but often enough, the proposal meets with approval and leads to business being done without delay. In all its dealings, the agency proceeds with caution and circumspection, so that neither the wealthy bride who is captured, nor her relatives, have the least idea by what means she became known to aristocratic bridegroom.

Occasionally the agency receives indirect applications from the fathers or relatives of American heiresses, who have heard of its existence, to find a suitable husband of aristocratic descent for some rich girl. Now and then, such an application has been received from the heiress or wealthy woman herself, but this happens rarely. As a rule, it is the European aristocrat who wants to catch an American pile of money which will enable him to live up to his position at the expense of his wife.

Constantly Consistent.

Two strikers were picketing the entrance of an alley during the strike at the factory of the Kellogg Switchboard and Supply Company in Chicago last May. A non-union man came out of the factory and started across the street. One of the strikers picked up a brick. As he looked at it an expression of disgust came over his face and he threw it down.

"Why didn't you throw it at that scab?" asked the other striker.

WRIGHT'S STRIKING "HUMAN DOCUMENT."

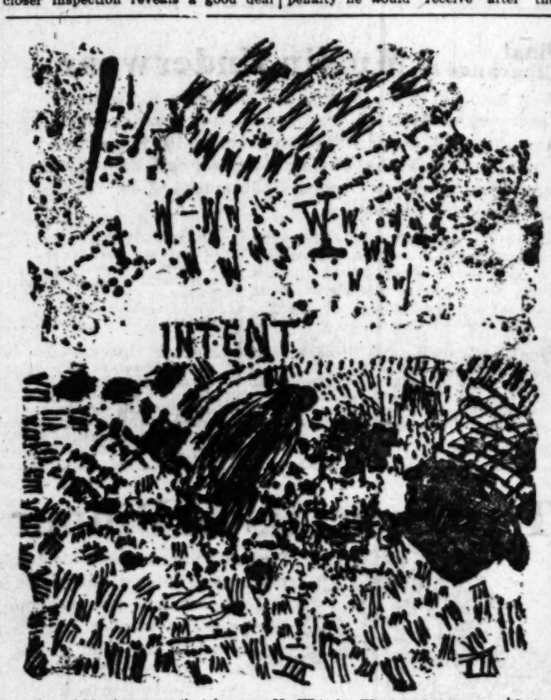
[STAFF CORRESPONDENCE OF THE TIMES.]

LONDON, Feb. 1.—Here is a facsimile of what can be described as one of the most striking "human documents" of recent years. It is a reproduction of the piece of blotting paper on which the late Whittaker Wright scribbled absently as he sat with his counsel in the London King's Bench Court on the last day of his great trial—the day, too, on which, after being sentenced to seven years' penal servitude, he took his own life with poison.

Although at first glance the marks on this blotter appear to be nothing more than purposeless scribblings, a closer inspection reveals a good deal of what must have been passing in Wright's mind as the crimson-robed judge rehearsed in his address to the jury the details of the prisoner's career.

The word "intent" printed in capitals an inch high at the center of the sheet and the repetitions of the Roman numeral seven are the most striking parts of this last writing Whittaker Wright ever did. There is no doubt that while he sat with apparent calmness at the table with his lawyers he was anticipating what he knew must take place after the foreman of the jury rose to announce a verdict. When Wright traced the word which appears so prominently, in all probability he was composing the brief but rather impressive sentence with which he replied to the court's sentence—"My lord, all I have to say is that I am as innocent as any one in this court of any intention to deceive or defraud the shareholders."

After the conjuror of millions had made up his mind what he would say at the moment given him by law after the verdict had been pronounced, evidently his thoughts concentrated and remained for some time on the penalty he would receive after the verdict which there is every reason to believe he foresaw correctly. Well versed in the English mercantile law, he knew that the maximum punishment for a crime like his is seven years' penal servitude, and without question the fact dinned in his brain and found expression on the blotter in front of him. The top of the page, after a few irrelevant marks, was filled with the capital letter W many times repeated. All the marks on the paper were made with down strokes of the pen, the most natural motion to use on a soft blotter.



The piece of blotting paper that lay upon Mr. Whitaker Wright's desk in court. On it, his hand moving half consciously, he traced with a quill pen these uneasy various lines and letters. "Intent," in those bold printed capitals, was the last word he wrote.

PERSONAL—

Business.

PERSONAL—MRS. MASSON, the noted London palmist, whose work in Los Angeles has met with such cordial appreciation, may be consulted at 322 S. SPRING ST. by those desiring CAREFUL, CONSCIENTIOUS AND SCIENTIFIC HAND READINGS BY ONE OF THE FOREMOST PALMISTS OF THE DAY.

Mrs. Masson especially invites those whose experience with FRAUDULENT palmistry has rendered them skeptical as to there being any truth or value in the science.

MRS. MASSON'S READINGS APPEAL TO YOUR COMMON SENSE; they tell you of events WHICH HAVE OCCURRED IN THE PAST, and point out PRESENT and FUTURE prospects with such exactitude that you can safely guide yourself thereby, taking advantage of the good and endeavoring to avoid or overcome the evil.

Palmistry, PROPERLY PRACTICED, IS AWAY ABOVE TRICKERY OR GUESS WORK AND THE GREATEST WRITERS AND THINKERS IN THE WORLD ARE ITS ADVOCATES. It will tell you what occupation you are best fitted for, what accidents or illnesses you are liable to, also the length of your days, how to realize your highest ambition, and what your success will be socially, artistically and financially.

Details of domestic life are plainly indicated—in many cases the exact date of marriage, and number of children being shown, in men's as well as women's hands.

These facts are not mere coincidences, and if the knowledge which the TRUE palmistry undoubtedly gives will save you painful experiences and humiliating blunders, why not take advantage of this opportunity to learn?

HIGH-CLASS PATRONAGE SOLICITED. (Daily and Sundays.) 28

PERSONAL—HAVE YOUR HAND HONESTly read and the future events of your life accurately prognosticated by the skillful scientific palmist.

PROF. C. IRVIN ALTHOUSE.

Who has given many years of critical study to laws of scientific hand reading.

PROF. ALTHOUSE is pronounced by some of the best intellects of the day the finest reader of hands in this country. Hundreds, formerly read by Cheiro, admit his readings as being not only equal, but in many respects superior to that distinguished author. You can expect satisfactory results only from an ABSOLUTE MASTER of this science. If a palmist cannot deal correctly with your character, temperament, etc., and a good deal of your past life, do not place any faith in his skill in predicting future events.

PROF. ALTHOUSE read the hands of ELLA WHEELER WILCOX, also of E. H. SOTHERN, the brilliant actor, a student of palmistry, who says, "I find Your reading coincides with Cheiro's." BURTON HOLMES formerly read by Cheiro, says "Your (Prof. Althouse) reading is the most interesting I have ever had." Also read hands of Admiral Schley, Gov. Pardee, Senator Pettigrew, Frederick Warde, Mr. Edison, Mr. Leadbeater, Madame Modjeska, Mrs. Potter, William Crane, Cecilia Loftus, Virginia Harned, Mary Mannering, Dr. McIvor-Tyndall, Florence Roberts, Mrs. Langtry, James Neill, Rose Melville, Clarence Eddy, Capt. WE SELL MONEY MAKERS!

SOLID INVESTMENT PROPOSITIONS THAT WILL STAND THE CLOSEST INVESTIGATION. WE CAN ESTABLISH YOU IN A BUSINESS, WHETHER YOU HAVE $100 OR $50,000.

$50—A professional opportunity. This is a splendid chance for some one to acquire a well established dental practice in a growing location. Expenses are merely nominal and income is now about $300 per month.

$50—A Main st. restaurant; has a seating capacity of 30 people; well established, and has been producing a net income of $300 month for several years.

$400—Well established book and stationery business; recommended by one of the best people in that line in the city.

$400—For a general merchandise business in near-by country town. This is a populous locality, and the store practically controls the business of the surrounding country.

$14,000—Will buy a hardware and implement business in one of the southern towns. We consider this the best revenue producer that is on our books. If you have the amount in cash, we want you to come and see us.

$250—THIS WILL PURCHASE WHAT WE HONESTLY THINK IS THE BEST HOTEL PROPOSITION IN THE CITY OF LOS ANGELES TODAY. IT WILL BUY A HOTEL THAT IS NOW OCCUPIED COMPLETELY, AND WHICH PRODUCES A NET MONTHLY REVENUE OF ABOUT $250. THIS IS AN OLD ESTABLISHED NAME AND WELL-KNOWN PROPOSITION, AND IF YOU HAVE THE MONEY WE DO NOT THINK IT WILL TAKE YOU VERY LONG TO DECIDE THAT YOU HAVE STRUCK A "BONANZA."

$25—Takes a well established rooming-house upon which you can have a five years' lease, and we think an inventory of same in 35 rooms would be much in excess of the price asked.

$250—The grocery store we have at this time is one of the few smaller stores in this city in the city that will pay you for your stock. We unhesitatingly recommend this to any prospective purchaser who wants to take possession of a well-established business in good location, and which pays well; a fine side line pushed, and can be very materially increased merely by soliciting and without additional capital.

$1500 will put you in possession of the best general merchandise store in Southern California; located in a town within 30 minutes' electric ride from Los Angeles; it supplies one of the wealthiest sections of agricultural country in this vicinity. The present owner would prefer to retain an interest of one-half or one-fifth in this if possible. Don't miss this chance if you want to make an unusual per cent. on your money.

Arizona. We have a proposition from one of the foremost wholesale concerns in the western country to dispose of their retail stores throughout Arizona and Mexico. These stores are located in the best business sections of Arizona, and can be handled on basis of from $5000 to $10,000; are the best kind of dividend payers, and are on the market only to prevent conflict between the wholesale and retail divisions of the business of present owners.

The above are only a few of the good things we have in our list. We can locate you in any business in any section of the city or country, no matter what amount you want to invest. We will give you the benefit of our experience and place you where you can get a good revenue. We will not recommend any business to a prospective purchaser without first investigating same and will give you a certificate as to the worth of the business, you can bank on it absolutely.

$500—HAVE YOU BEEN LOOKING FOR GOOD INVESTMENTS? BRING THEM IN. EDWARD D. SILENT & CO., Members L. A. Realty Board. 216-218 W. Second st.

SAN DIEGO—

San Diego has at last waked up to her great future, and property of all kinds there is beginning to boom. The writer has an option on a large body of land suitable for subdivision. This land is located in the northern suburbs of the city; the only direction in which the city can grow, and is growing, and is the only large tract of level and desirable land to be obtained suitable for subdivision. My option calls for a VERY LOW price for the land, with liberal release clause. Will take about $20,000 cash to handle it, for which I desire to organize a syndicate of several people and in which I will take an interest. This proposition offers a splendid opportunity to clean up a big lot of money with but little risk. For interview and further information, address B, box 6, TIMES OFFICE.

County Endeavor Convention the Best Ever.

Long Beach Captures Prize for Next Year.

Dr. Chapman in at Finish With Warm Talk.

Here is a convention in which rival delegations quoted scripture at each other.

There have been conventions before this one, in which delegations have hurled things at each other, but they have not always originated in the Bible.

Yesterday in the County Christian Endeavor Convention at Whittier, the rivals were Pasadena and Long Beach; they both wanted to entertain the convention next year.

Pasadena had come in on the first day with what seemed to be a big banner, but yesterday Long Beach raised a hurrah by toting one in that was four times as big, painted in four colors and combining Christian Endeavor, the delights of the beach and the joys of fishing from the wharf.

The spokesman for the Pasadena delegation said he did not believe in exploiting side issues, and that the man sitting on the wharf might be fishing on Sunday.

Rev. Dr. A. T. Bateman, chairman of the committee to make a recommendation to the convention, brought joy to the hearts of the Pasadenans by several times referring to the fact that they were first on the ground, and they wore smiles as broad as the dome of Echo Mountain observatory. He said neither town has a saloon, both are pleasure resorts; that Pasadena had the convention two years ago, Long Beach five years ago, and, he said, the claim is made that they have Sunday band concerts in Pasadena.

This reference to the band concerts did not occasion a smile, but, on the contrary, everybody looked very grave.

The last straw that threw Pasadena down hard was when Dr. Bateman quoted scripture to the effect that "the first shall be last and the last shall be first," and ended by recommending that it be Long Beach in 1906.

Pasadena's spokesman, McDougall Snowball, followed, but said nothing about the awful wickedness of a city that would permit Sunday concerts, but he called down upon Long Beach the deserved fate that should befall those who come at "the eleventh hour."

A Long Beach delegate responded, among other things reminding the convention that "those who came at the eleventh hour received as much as those who came earlier."

The vote almost unanimously sustained the report of the committee, and the slogan is "Long Beach, 1905."

New delegates enrolling yesterday morning increased the total to close to 600, making this convention not only the largest, but the most enthusiastic, entertaining and instructive ever held in Los Angeles county. All the sessions were crowded yesterday, notwithstanding the rain that set in at noon.

FELT AT HOME.

A neat incident, not down on the programme, was the visit of a young lady who brought greetings from the Epworth leagues of Whittier. She expressed the hope that same day all churches might be one, as Christian Endeavor is one, and said facetiously: "My grandmother tells me she can remember when Methodists were not respected, but I feel perfectly at home among you."

One of the best talks of the convention was that of Miss Sadie I. Tuthill of Los Angeles, State superintendent of the department of Bible study. Her subject was "The Need of Bible Study."

"Far too often," she said, "we rush out into the world with a message of our own, instead of the message of the gospel."

Rev. A. R. Prichard made an excellent talk upon the same subject.

A social committee conference was conducted by Mrs. R. W. Bailey, lookout by J. O. Smith, and a conference of intermediate superintendents, by Mrs. M. B. Follett. J. E. White, president of the State Union, made a helpful talk upon good citizenship. "When we speak of citizenship, we naturally turn toward election booths and ballot boxes, but good citizenship first of all is dependent upon good manhood. I must first set up in my own life a standard of righteousness and purity before I can demand it of others."

Dr. Sara E. Wise of San Francisco eloquently pressed the claims of the Endeavor Hospital Association.

TACTFUL YOUNG LADY.

A conference in the subject of systematic giving was conducted by Miss Anna G. Fraser, who, in the course of her remarks, said: "Somebody has said that an educated church is a giving church, and I have noticed—I have noticed—that the societies that have given most during the year are those societies that have read the most."

Miss Fraser is a most tactful leader as well as an eloquent speaker. "S'pose you stand; some of them can't just hear," she said to a lady who began to speak without rising.

On the subject of literature Miss Fraser, who is a Presbyterian, said: "I have some excellent literature issued by the Baptists that I use because I find it most helpful, though I am not a Baptist. I have several Methodist pamphlets of which I make use, though I am not a Methodist. Some people keep right on using publications of other denominations though their own may publish some that are much better."

The question box in this conference was handled in an interesting way by Leonard Merrill.

THE INTERMEDIATES.

A meeting in the interest of the Intermediate societies was led by Allen Bixby of Pasadena, the programme being filled by intermediates from all over the county. The participants were Lloyd Lorbeer of Pomona, Robert Dougherty of Pasadena, Lois Tabor of Whittier, Miss Skinner of Pasadena and Edward Newell of San José. Statt superintendent, who made interesting talks upon the importance of the intermediate department. Mrs. M. B. Follett of Pasadena was moderator of the session.

JUNIORS' SESSION.

Miss Belle White, county superintendent of the junior department, presided at the round-up of the little folks, but the leader was one of them. His name is Willie Kennedy of Los Angeles. Other juniors who took part were Elmer Garrett, Clarence Garrett and there was a song by a number of the Whittier juniors. Rev. C. S. Billings delivered an address upon the inspiration of work among the children.

Conferences were held in the afternoon upon the subjects of Christian citizenship, prayer-meeting committee, Quiet-Hour and junior superintendents.

OFFICERS AND RESOLUTIONS.

The following officers were elected to serve during the coming year: President, D. A. Schweitzer, Los Angeles; vice-president, Walter Dean, Long Beach; secretary, Miss Clara Tebbitts, Whittier; corresponding secretary, Mrs. C. H. Carter, Pomona; treasurer, McD. Snowball, Pasadena. Superintendents: Junior, Miss Belva Rice, Los Angeles; intermediate, Mrs. M. B. Follett, Pasadena; tenth legion, J. M. Rust, Los Angeles; quiet hour, Miss Anna L. Tomlinson, Whittier; good citizenship, J. A. Laws, Pasadena.

Resolutions were adopted returning thanks to the people of Whittier and to the officials of the State Reform School for courtesies, and giving full indorsement to the Anti-Saloon League.

LAST SESSION.

DR. CHAPMAN'S ADDRESS.

The final session of the convention was held last night. The newly-elected officers were installed by State President White and Dr. E. S. Chapman, superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League, delivered an address entitled "Answering the Roll Call." He spoke in part as follows:

"In the movement for the suppression of the saloon in the city of Los Angeles the league is in very nearly the same condition it has been during all these years of our work in Southern California," said Dr. Chapman. "When party prohibitionists affiliated with us in the work we have been glad. When they could not, we have never had one work of reproach or reflection to utter upon their sincerity. Some of our greatest victories have been won in spite of their most earnest opposition. In others they have had with us a part.

"For three years and more the Anti-Saloon League has been moving steadily in the direction of a campaign in this city.

"In this work we received, soon after the holidays, a request for a conference with some friends of temperance reform. This was cheerfully granted and the request was made that the league should unite with the churches, etc., etc., in forming a federation against the liquor traffic. This, of course, we could not entertain for a moment. The league is itself such a federation, the fullest and most perfect and effective federation of churches and temperance organizations ever consummated in human history.

"For us to join in a movement for a federation would be an acknowledgement that we were not a federation, and an indignity to all the societies which have united in constituting this league, committing to us its work of temperance reform and the funds necessary for its accomplishment.

"After the first attempt to form a new federation there were no points of difference between us and our prohibition conferees save the issues to be involved in the campaign. Respecting these the statements of the newspapers have been substantially correct. These individuals desired a campaign in an effort to abolish all six of the distinctive features of the liquor traffic, to wit, the manufacture, wholesale, retail, restaurants and hotels with meals, and drug stores otherwise than upon prescriptions.

"It is probable that the personal preference of every member of the league favored all this, but the league was united in the conviction that such a movement at the present time would not be likely to succeed.

"When, after nearly two months of patient conference, the members of the league found themselves utterly unable to consent to a campaign upon the plan favored by those who were in conference with us, we stated our position to them with great frankness and declared our purpose, in the fear of God, to go forward according to the only plan which we, at that time, had reason to believe would be successful.

"When this decision was reached and announced we certainly had reason to believe that those who had conferred with us in a spirit so dominated by Christian friendliness, would give to this movement as full and hearty support as their consciences would permit.

"It should, however, be fully and clearly understood that the only movement representing all the churches and societies opposed to the saloon is that which has been decided upon and is being conducted by the federation of all churches and temperance societies—the Anti-Saloon League.

"Just now is a good time to remember that the great victories in Southern California in which we have so heartily rejoiced are the same as those by which we hope to banish the saloon from the city of Los Angeles, and then carry forward the good work to every nook and corner of our glorious, beautiful and beloved Southern California.

"We present to the people of Los Angeles city a single proposition—the suppression of the beverage liquor traffic, including the saloon, the hotel bar and the sale by druggists excepting upon a physician's prescription. We do not ask anyone to consent to any other feature of the liquor traffic by voting against these."

TRIES TO SHUFFLE OFF.

Despondent because of a spree, and practically penniless because a woman he had trusted had relieved him of his month's salary, Charles Daugherty, aged 29, an employé of the Southern Pacific shops, whose home is on South Workman street, East Los Angeles, made an unsuccessful attempt to commit suicide last night. At the Kirkwood rooming-house on North Main street he took half an ounce of morphia and a pint or more of whisky. Daugherty drew his pay Friday and started on a spree. Friday night while with a woman who lives on San Fernando street his money was taken. Light night after securing a room he sent a note to his sister, who is the wife of Deputy Sheriff Barnhill, telling her to come to him because he was dying. With her husband she went to the Kirkwood and found Daugherty unconscious. At the Receiving Hospital he was restored to consciousness, but was not considered out of danger at a late hour.

NEWMAN CLUB TOMORROW.

The Newman Club will meet at Levy's Cafe tomorrow evening, and after the usual monthly dinner will listen to a paper by Frank J. Heil on "Orestes Brownson."

Two Collars, but No Cravat.

Speaker Cannon entered his private office the other morning much preoccupied. Neal, the colored messenger of a succession of speakers, noticed there was something lacking in Mr. Cannon's attire. The cravat was missing.

In fact, the Speaker had come all the way from his residence to the Capitol without one. He was worried by the discovery. Just a few moments before he had come from his barber shop, where he had made another discovery, which he has not yet been able to fully explain.

As he was about to take his seat in the tonsorial artist's chair, it was suggested to him that he would do well to remove his collar. Then Mr. Cannon pinched himself to ascertain whether he was asleep or waking.

"I thought I had just removed that collar," said he, and he went to the hook on the wall and satisfied his old eyes that he had. There was the particular piece of linen suspended. But he could not dispute there was another collar still around his neck, and he removed it to the same hook upon the wall.

Mr. Cannon had come to the Capitol wearing two collars, but no cravat. How he got them on the Speaker does not know, but it was done somehow in a fit of abstraction.—[Washington Post.

GOULD TAKES INITIAL LOOK.

Railroad Magnate Here for Forty Minutes.

Distinguished Party on Fine Special Train.

Flying Locomotive Reels Off Many Miles.

George Gould, New York's multi-millionaire railroad magnate, spent about forty minutes in Los Angeles yesterday. The newspaper men who climbed unceremoniously over the rear rail of his sumptuous car at Naud Junction were the first to greet him on his initial trip into the City of the Angels, and most of the brief period within its limits he spent standing on the rear platform as carelessly as any tourist would have stood, bareheaded, with his hands in his pockets, chatting pleasantly with his unbidden guests and remarking upon such features of the outskirts of the city as he could see through the rain as the special train was switched about under the brow of Elysian Park, transferring from the Southern Pacific to the Santa Fé tracks for the run to San Diego.

The train ran by Naud Junction the distance of a block or so before coming to a momentary stop, and the reporters went walloping through the oily, muddy muck of Alameda street full tilt after the magnate's receding coach. As they swung on wherever they could find a purchase, Mr. Gould reached down to open the gate of the observation platform and extended a helping hand.

"Certainly, climb on," he said; "fine day, isn't it? Step in and sit down; never mind muddy feet."

Mr. Gould was in a good humor yesterday; perhaps that is a habit with him. At least, there was nothing in the unostentatious traveler to suggest any other mood. He wouldn't talk railway affairs and "Gould lines" plans—of course not, on a moment's notice, on the back platform.

"Are you interested in the Western Pacific's advent to the Coast, Mr. Gould?"

"No, I am not concerned in that."

"Or in the proposed San Diego and Eastern?"

"No."

"Is it the intention to extend the Gould system to a Pacific Coast outlet?"

"No, there is nothing of that kind in prospect now. My relations with the Southern Pacific and the Santa Fé are very friendly at present. It is not a good time now to build. This rain means a great deal to this country, I suppose," he continued, getting to subjects nearer at hand. He was assured that it means prosperity to this section, and therefore increased business for railroads, and he conceded that it was indeed a fine thing to see the rain falling on Southern California, although he and his companions had come looking for sunshine and a hot day.

INTEREST IN LOS ANGELES.

The young financier expressed great interest in Los Angeles and the contiguous country through which he had traveled, and said he hoped to spare a day to drive about the city before going north.

As to financial conditions in the East, he said: "There is a slight temporary tightening of business noticeable in the East. There has been a tendency to overspeculate in railroad securities. In the South the cotton crop has been splendid, and conditions are very prosperous. In Arkansas and Missouri the staple products are especially plentiful this year, and the conditions seem splendid."

Mr. Gould paid a special compliment to the excellent condition of the Southern Pacific's roadbed, over which he has traveled, and referred particularly to the section from Yuma into Los Angeles, over which he was accompanied by Superintendent R. H. Ingram of this city, who met the train with his private car at the former station and accompanied the party here.

DISTINGUISHED PARTY.

The Gould train that rolled into Riverside Station at about 5 o'clock in the afternoon brought one of the most distinguished railway parties that ever came to Los Angeles in a "bunch." The special was made up, besides the baggage car, of four private coaches of as many different railway officials. In addition to Mr. Gould, the Eastern party consisted of his wife and Kingdon Gould; E. T. Jeffery, president of the Denver and Rio Grande; L. S. Thorne, vice-president and general manager of the Texas and Pacific; Leroy Trice, vice-president and general manager of the International and Great Northern; George Kramer, vice-president of the Colorado Midland; Benjamin Nicoll, an iron and coal magnate of New York; O. B. Huntsman, tutor to Mr. Gould's sons; W. F. McClelland, secretary to Mr. Gould and Mr. Jeffery on the trip; and Messrs. Crow and Joiner, secretaries respectively to Mr. Thorne and Mr. Trice.

The private cars were Mr. Gould's "A1" of the Missouri Pacific, Mr. Jeffery's Denver and Rio Grande car "Baby Clare," Mr. Thorne's Texas and Pacific car "100," and Superintendent Ingram's car "Miraflores," which was attached at Yuma.

The original party started westward from New York February 11, and proceeded leisurely by the Southern route, inspecting the lines of the Gould system. The train was drawn through Texas clear to this city by the same engine, No. 264, a speedy Texas and Pacific monster, and one of the prides of that system. Over certain stretches between Yuma and this city the machine pulled the special along at a rate of seventy-five miles an hour, which Mr. Gould pronounced a good test for the Espee's roadbed.

Shortly after 5:30 the party proceeded from La Grande depot on the run to San Diego, where Mr. Gould is to join his wife, who arrived in Southern California some days ago in another special train. Mr. Kramer left the party to remain here until tomorrow.

Mr. Gould expects to spend several days at Coronado, and will probably put in ten days or more on the Coast unless suddenly called East.

EIGHT-TENTHS OF AN INCH.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA GETS A GOOD WETTING.

Fall is General but Greater in Some Localities Than in Others—Snow in the Mountains of Kern County—No More Likely Soon.

The greater part of an inch of rain fell in and about Los Angeles yesterday afternoon and evening. Reports received last night indicate that the downpour was general over Southern California. Some localities received a good deal over an inch and others apparently not as much as did Los Angeles.

Assistant Observer Fuller of the United States Weather Bureau made a special reading at 10 o'clock last night and reported a fall of .75 inch for the storm, making 3.27 inches for the season. At a corresponding date a year ago there had 8.60 inches fallen for the season. Mr. Fuller reported the conditions as unfavorable for a continuance of the fall.

The reading of the rain gauge on the roof of The Times building at 1 o'clock this morning showed a fall of .50 inch for the storm. Allowing for the slight precipitation after 10 p.m. that corresponds closely with the measurements of the government weather bureau.

Pasadena received a liberal wetting. In many places the storm sewers were inadequate to accommodate the flow of water.

Catalina Island received a moderate wetting a day ahead of the mainland. Fifteen-hundredths inch of of rain fell at Avalon Friday. The island seems to have shared evenly with Los Angeles and vicinity in yesterday evening's fall.

San Pedro and vicinity shared in yesterday's downpour.

The storm was later in arrival at Riverside. It began there at 8:45 o'clock last evening.

A light shower came early yesterday morning in and about Bakersfield. At 2 p.m. it began falling rapidly and continued so till late last night. Ditches in Kern county are full and there is a great deal of snow in the mountains.

Ventura county received a good wetting. From 5 a.m. to 6 p.m. yesterday the precipitation was 1.25 inches; total for season, 5 inches.

In Santa Barbara the rain began at 6 a.m. and continued uninterruptedly all day. At nightfall 1.87 inches had fallen, making a total of 5.20 inches for the season.

There was a considerable precipitation in and about Santa Ana and Fullerton, according to reports from those places.

AMOUNTS TO DECLINATION.

SENATOR BARD'S DECLARATION AS TO RE-ELECTION.

Tone of His Letter Not Satisfactory to His Political Friends in Ventura County—Says He Will Not Solicit Honor.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF THE TIMES.]

VENTURA, Feb. 27.—Senator Bard has stated his position regarding the United States Senatorship. The following letter was written by him to D. J. Reese of this county several weeks ago. In tone it was not what the friends of the Senator desired and they have since tried to get from him some definite announcement of his candidacy. This not being forthcoming the letter was today given to the public in this city. After stating his appreciation of the writer's desire that he be a candidate, Senator Bard says:

"Your inquiry is whether I desire a reelection. But I must first say that my wishes ought really to have very little consideration in the matter. From my standpoint they have nothing to do with it.

"I have no hesitation in saying that I have no inclination to offer my services for another term. This is not, however, due to any want of appreciation of the honor that has been conferred upon me nor to any dislike of the legitimate work that it imposes.

No man in such a position is without the hope that his services may meet the approval of his constituents, even though such hope must depend upon the indulgence of the public judgment upon shortcomings which his own consciousness will not excuse. I have no apologies to make for any of my official acts, for they are all the results of my convictions of duty, and I have no regrets to express in respect to any of them.

"The shortcomings to which I allude are such as were anticipated when I accepted the responsibilities of the office in my short speech to the Legislature in which I intimated that I had misgivings whether the honor then conferred upon me should be accepted. After my four years service the people of the State are the best judges to decide whether these limitations to which I allude are likely to prevent me from serving their interests satisfactorily and whether my experience is an asset worth having to the State.

"I am not intending to challenge anyone to a contest. I am intending only to state that I do not offer myself as a candidate for reelection. I will not, therefore, make any effort to be reelected, and will not accept the honor of a reelection unless it comes without solicitation on my part. Whether this attitude can be practically dealt with I leave to you and other friends to decide.

"The instrumentality of party organization is a necessity, not only for the purpose of securing success for political principles and important measures, but also for choosing men to represent such principles and measures. The machinery of parties is also recognized as a necessity, but very often this machinery is seized and made the instrumentality by which the selfish purposes of a few shrewd men are made to appear to be the sentiment and decision of the people. It can be perverted, and is misused. We all know that the associations of candidates can be promoted through this instrumentality by promises and other inducements. An indorsement of that kind possesses no value in my estimation.

"I will not permit my name to be used by anyone as pledged to any promise whatever except in support of the platform of the party. The oath of office covers all the promises that need be made.

"To a politician like yourself, I am quite sure that my position, while recognized as theoretically correct, will appear to be untenable if I expect to be reelected. But my expectations do not enter into the discussion. I do not anticipate what the Legislature may do. I will do nothing myself to influence any of the members in the matter. If it should elect me, I should consider it a recommendation, of course, but if it should elect someone else I shall not, under the circumstances, consider it a rebuke.

"And so all this is to be summed up by the statement that only in the event that public sentiment should be so pronounced in favor of my reelection that the honor shall be tendered me substantially as it was before, do I desire to be considered as a candidate."

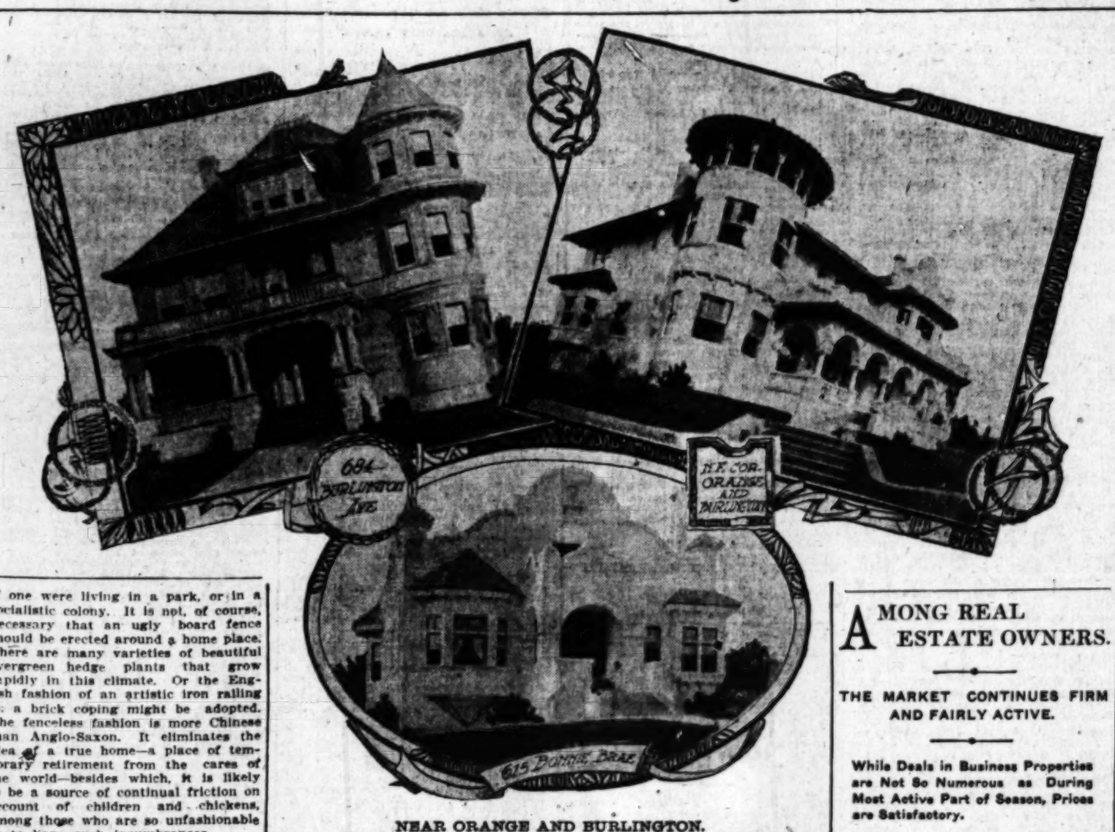
XXIIIrd YEAR. SUNDAY, MORNING, FEBRUARY 28, 1904. PRICE 5 CENTS.

"HOUSE AND LOT"—The Times' Weekly Review of Real Estate and Building.

FACT AND COMMENT.

NOTWITHSTANDING the phenomenal growth of this section during the past few years, and the corresponding great rise in the value of real estate, it is satisfactory to note that there has, so far, been very little of the old boom spirit injected into real estate transactions. Reference is here specially made to the subdivision of city or suburban residence property, which was the favorite field for wild-cat operations during the boom of seventeen years ago. A few subdivisions have been placed on the market where the "improvements" consist almost entirely of the surveyor's stakes, but they are greatly in the minority, a majority of the subdividers recognizing the fact that people demand good improvements and that prices may be fixed in accordance. The man who expects that he can purchase a fifty-foot lot, within twenty minutes of the business center of Los Angeles, with the paper street improvements made, for $50 or even less, really deserves little commiseration, when he finds that he has acquired a piece of property on a steep side hill, with no means of getting up to it. All who are interested in the solid growth and prosperity of Los Angeles should frown upon any subdivision enterprises that savor of the wild-cat order. We are having a good healthy growth, and real estate men are making money in legitimate operations. Let us not kill the goose that lays the golden egg. If it were possible, it would be a good thing to have an ordinance forbidding the platting of any tract in the city, unless certain reasonable street improvements are made. However, property owners have a right to do about as they please with their property, short of committing a public nuisance—a rather vague term, by the way. The only thing to be done is for public opinion and the public press to discourage and frown upon any attempt to inject any such undesirable features into the real estate development of this favored city.



NEAR ORANGE AND BURLINGTON.

Co-operative Colonies.

The plan of settling in cooperative colonies has been tried a good many times in this State, but has rarely proved permanently successful. In most cases, these colonies have been dissolved after a brief and more or less tempestuous existence. This has generally been due, not to fraud, but to lack of good business management. The drawback to such movements may generally be found to be covered by the old saying: "What's everybody's business is nobody's business." There must always be some responsible head to every undertaking, whether it's a colony, a manufacturing establishment, or a war ship. The most notable effort along this line in Southern California was the cooperative colony at Clearwater, founded about fifteen years ago. The original settlers at Clearwater had organized for the purpose of joining the cooperative colony at Topolobampo, in Mexico, run by a man named Owen, who appears to have been very much of an autocrat; but hearing bad reports of that enterprise, from one who had been there, the plans of the colony were changed, and a tract of rather poor land was bought of the Bixby brothers for $40 an acre. The cooperative features of this enterprise were soon dropped. The place is now a thrifty little settlement, with two centers of population, one at Clearwater and the other at Hynes, formerly known as South Clearwater, where there is a cooperative creamery which, like almost all the other enterprises of this kind in Southern California, has proved highly successful. It seems that a creamery is one institution which may safely be run on a cooperative principle. While, as stated, cooperation has not proved eminently successful in the settlement of land in California, there seems to be no good reason why an enterprise of this kind, organized on a practical basis, with an experienced, conscientious and practical man, paid a good salary, in addition to his interest, to manage the enterprise, should not succeed. Certainly a great saving may be effected by cooperation in purchasing supplies, working up raw materials, marketing its products and so forth, while leaving each individual settler perfectly free.

Great Building Record.

Another remarkable record has been made by Los Angeles in the building line, as reported in this department last week, where a table was published showing the number and value of building permits in twenty-one of the leading cities of the country for the month of January. This statement showed Los Angeles to be fourth on the list, with permits amounting to $875,744, being only exceeded by New York, Chicago and San Francisco. Yet this was considerably less than an average month for Los Angeles, as may be seen from the fact that the total number of building permits in Los Angeles last year amounted in value to over $13,000,000. In number of building permits Los Angeles came third, being only exceeded by Greater New York and Seattle.

Not Supplemental Advertising.

The majority of real estate agents and dealers undoubtedly understand the position of The Times, as repeatedly set forth in these columns, concerning the purpose of these reviews. Incidentally it may be mentioned that the purposes and views of The Times on the general subject of the joint and several duties of the press, and of dealers, toward the investing public, in connection with present development and growth, seem also to be understood. The hearty cooperation of agents and dealers, moreover, in standing for the principles of fair dealing advocated by The Times cannot be otherwise than gratifying. For them The Times is cheerfully disposed to do anything consistent with the legitimate duties of journalism. There are still, however, a few who seemingly mistake the purposes of this department. To them we may say again that these reviews are not intended as an advertisement of agents, nor as a bid for their advertisements. Only such portion of matter submitted for publication in this department will, therefore, be used as is consistent with our own ideas of what is desirable and appropriate. As previously explained, mere strings of sales, in which properties are simply designated by lot and block numbers, are not news. The location by streets, and a description of the property which gives the size of the lot and a statement concerning its improvements, is an essential part of such reports of sales as are to be given to the general public through these columns. The lists of transfers giving all the deeds placed on record appear daily in The Times, and it is not intended to reproduce them here for the sake of showing what particular agents are doing. Good, full value in the advertising columns for the sums spent will be accorded, and the liberal patronage of agents is appreciated; but in selecting matter for publication as real estate news we must be governed by our estimate of its value as news, and not by the amount spent in advertising in this newspaper by any particular agent or firm.

Sunset Boulevard.

The improvement of Sunset boulevard is steadily approaching completion. Residents along the route of the boulevard should now take up the subject of planting shade trees. As The Times has said, a boulevard without shade trees can scarcely be properly called a boulevard at all. Why not do something on Arbor Day—March 17? The question will be discussed at a meeting of the Sunset Boulevard Improvement Association, to be held at Bixby Station on Friday evening next, when it is also expected that Mr. Bixby and other members of the Hollywood Board of Trade will attend, to bring up the proposition of lighting the boulevard for its whole length.

Vacant Lots and High Fences.

The story has recently been told in the local papers of a dispute between residents in the southwestern part of the city, one of whom objected to the style of a modest cottage close beside him, the occupants of which could look into his dining-room window and see what the family had for dinner. He started to build a high board fence at the edge of the lot, so as to cut off his neighbor's view of the premises. This brings to mind the suggestion recently made in these columns that it is a great mistake for people who are able to put up expensive houses to content themselves with a single fifty-foot lot, where land is still so comparatively cheap as it may be in and around Los Angeles. Anyone who aims to put up more than a very modest cottage should seek to secure at least two lots. Three would be still better, as by building on the central lot the other two lots could, if necessary, be disposed of separately—and probably at a good profit—should the owner ever wish to move away. Another feature that the editor of this department does not approve, as being contrary to the idea of a true home, is the habit of leaving the borders of a cemetery entirely open, so that one feels as if one were living in a park, or in a socialistic colony. It is not, of course, necessary that an ugly board fence should be erected around a home place. There are many varieties of beautiful evergreen hedge plants that grow rapidly in this climate. Or the English fashion of an artistic iron railing or a brick coping might be adopted. The fenceless fashion is more Chinese than Anglo-Saxon. It eliminates the idea of a true home—a place of temporary retirement from the cares of the world—besides which, it is likely to be a source of continual friction on account of children and chickens, among those who are so unfashionable as to have such incumbrances.

One of Her Grandfathers.

"Some of my family have been very long-lived," said the woman in the cerise panne hat. "My father died at 40, but one of my grandfathers lived to be 95."

"Which grandfather was that?" asked the white beaver.

"Oh," said the lady in cerise, "that was my grandfather by my first husband."—[Washington Post.

FOR SECOND AND OLIVE STREETS.

AMONG REAL ESTATE OWNERS.

THE MARKET CONTINUES FIRM AND FAIRLY ACTIVE.

While Deals in Business Properties are Not So Numerous as During Most Active Part of Season, Prices are Satisfactory.

The number of sales of business properties was not so great last week as during the preceding week. It can not, of course, be expected that the market will continue as brisk as it was about the first of the year. The aggregate of large deals in close-in business and prospective business properties was then between $500,000 and $1,000,000 each week, and the addition of the sales in residence properties would swell this sum to still larger figures. The market, however, is all that could reasonably expected and all that could be desired from the standpoint of healthy and continuous growth. Strict business properties are sold in this city at prices closely related to their present earning capacities. Prospective business properties are undoubtedly beyond the point of present earning capacities and in some cases pretty close to the point of what those earning capacities can be made by the erection of the best grade of business improvements that the present state of trade and the reasonably certain future prospects of the city warrants. They are, of course, not near the prices that they will in time attain, but owners who can use money to advantage take some risks when they refuse offers that are far beyond present earning capacities of properties. Owners who feel that they cannot reinvest to advantage and who do not need the money are, of course, safe in holding their properties. The man who expects a general slump in real-estate values in this municipality will be deceived. A temporary shrinkage in specific localities may take place; and widespread financial disturbances might even cause a general decline for a short period; but that the general and ultimate tendency of all real-estate values here will be upward there is practically no doubt. Trading in residence properties continues active, and the prices charged are generally fair to buyers.

For Subdivision.

Mrs. Clara R. Shatto has sold to Strong and Dickinson eight acres, unimproved, on the south side of Wilshire boulevard, between Virgil and Miami streets; consideration named, $30,000. The buyers are said to intend dividing the property into twenty lots that will average 60x162 feet each, and have well-graded streets with twenty-foot sidewalks. Building restrictions sufficient to insure the erection of very substantial dwellings are to be enforced; and, with the extension of Seventh street westward, this will, undoubtedly, be made a very desirable residence subdivision.

In Raymond Park Tract.

The auction sale of lots of the Raymond Park tract, held last Thursday by the S. W. Ferguson Company with Rhoades, Reed & Co., as auctioneers, was fairly well attended, but the prices realized were close figures. The lots are about 50x160 feet each, and the location in the neighborhood of the Raymond Hotel and only twenty-two minutes' ride from the business center of this city is a good one. Thirty-four lots were disposed of at prices ranging from $200 to $800, and aggregating about $17,000. Among the buyers were: James W. Barnes, E. M. Clark, Miss Pauline Cook, Harold F. Smith, Mrs. B. Octavia, F. R. Potts, William McLean, E. Sorrafree, D. W. Hurst, L. H. O'Conner, D. W. Hurst, C. M. Kisbough, C. J. Fowler, Warren Hibbard, J. R. Denny, Thomas Buckley, F. A. Dinsmore, and Dr. B. Zachau. A handsome eleven-room two-story frame dwelling with lot 100x153 feet on the corner of Palermo avenue and Center street was sold at the same time to A. McHenry; consideration named, $6650.

In the Ramsaur Tract.

The Ramsaur tract, which was placed upon the market a few weeks ago by C. M. Graves is now handled by Graves & Fountain. That firm reports the sale during the past week of fifty unimproved half-acre lots at prices ranging from $250 to $350, and aggregating about $15,000. Among the purchasers are George Holm, James Shultz, Willis D. Wetmore, William Kunstman, W. W. Slater, C. A. Carey, Albert Dunlap, John Stevens, Joseph Stevens and Miss R. Koch. Most of the purchases were made for homes, and are to be improved by the buyers. It is reported that the Pacific Electric Railway Company is preparing to erect a depot and platform on Ramsaur avenue, where it crosses the company's line to Long Beach. This will undoubtedly prove a convenience to settlers in the tract. Twenty teams are now at work grading the streets of the subdivision. A carload of 2-inch water pipe for the use of the tract is reported as now on the way from Pittsburgh. It will be used in piping water to each half-acre lot. Next Wednesday the sinking of a well will be undertaken.

Elysian Vista Scott Tract.

A new subdivision to be known as the Elysian Vista Scott tract has been subdivided, and is to be placed upon the market, by Mrs. E. M. Scott. It contains fifty acres located about two blocks north of Sunset boulevard, with Elysian Park on the east and Lake Shore avenue on the west. It has been divided into 195 lots ranging from 50x120 to 150x300 feet. They are all good building sites, and the view from some of the more elevated is certainly one of the finest of the many fine views to be found in the northwestern portion of the city. The Elysian Park car line runs through the center of the subdivision from Scott avenue on the south to Avalon street on the north. It connects with the electric line of the Los Angeles-Pacific Railroad Company, and passengers receive transfers thereto and reach the business center of the city in fifteen minutes on a 5-cent fare. The Pacific-Electric Railway Company's line to Glendale will skirt the tract on the west. City water is provided for each lot, and the subdivision claims the advantages of position in the frostless belt. The lots are to be placed on the market at from $100 to $500 apiece and an office for the dissemination of information has been established on the tract at the northeast corner of Scott avenue and Echo Park.

On West Ninth Street.

A. J. Botts sells to C. H. Green, through the McGarvin & Bronson Company, 46½x155 feet, on the southeast corner of Ninth and Sunbury streets, partly improved with a substantial eleven-room frame dwelling; consideration named, $7550. Lot is to be further improved later.

Alfalfa and Barley Ranch.

Patrick Griffin has purchased of Alfred Workman, through L. L. Bowen, a 221-acre ranch about six and a half miles northeast of this city on the county road to Verdugo, with comfortable dwelling, good barns, well and pumping plant; consideration named, $20,000. About fourteen acres are in deciduous fruits; remainder is planted in alfalfa, barley and small grain. Bought for a home.

On San Pedro and Winston.

Mrs. M. M. Shaw has sold to Ulrich Knock, through the Whitcomb-Gibson Company, 102x105 feet, unimproved, on the southwest corner of San Pedro and Winston streets; consideration named, $13,000. Buyer will improve with a substantial three-story brick business building that will have four stores on the ground floor and fittings for a commercial printing house on the two upper floors.

Alfalfa Ranch.

Dr. Thomas Davidson buys of Mary Clarbour, through Edward D. Silent & Co., sixty acres at Hynes; consideration named, $10,000. About half of the ranch is in alfalfa. There are also on the premises two dwellings and barns, and a fine 12-inch flowing well, which yields an abundant supply of water.

Partly an Exchange.

Theodore Wiesendanger buys of Mrs. Elizabeth Adams 50x130 feet, on the west side of Hill street, between Pico and Fourteenth streets with a small cottage; consideration named, $8000. He transfers in part payment 50x120 feet on the east side of Lenox avenue, midway betwen Sixteenth and Washington streets, with a new modern eight-room residence; consideration named, $5000.

Buy Homes.

The demand for medium-priced dwellings with well located lots for homes continues good. The following sales of that class of properties are reported by Bowen & Chamberlin: Mrs. M. D. Williamson to Alexander McDonald, a recent arrival from Dakota, who will occupy the place, 50x150 feet with an eight-room frame dwelling, No. 2652 Vermont avenue; consideration named $4500. Mrs. E. H. Phillips to J. P. McGue, who now occupies the property, a ten-room two-story frame dwelling, No. 2902 Hoover street, with lot 60x148 feet; consideration named $4500.

BY BUILDERS AND ARCHITECTS.

WORK IN BUILDING LINE STILL QUITE ACTIVE.

Houses Begun and Completed in Various Parts of the City—List of New Improvements Includes All Classes of Buildings.

The number of buildings completed during the week was as follows:

First Ward	10
Second Ward	2
Third Ward	3
Fourth Ward	8
Fifth Ward	12
Sixth Ward	29
Seventh Ward	5
Eighth Ward	1
Ninth Ward	6

Of these sixty-seven were dwellings and eight business buildings.

The number of buildings begun was sixty-six, seven of them being business buildings and the remainder dwellings, divided as follows:

First Ward	9
Second Ward	1
Third Ward	3
Fourth Ward	15
Fifth Ward	11
Sixth Ward	20
Seventh Ward	3
Ninth Ward	4

Little change is noted in the progress of work in the building line. No mammoth business blocks are being projected, but the number of average size, and small, business buildings that are planned, or are in progress, is indicative of steady growth; and the amount of the investments in dwellings is up to the average.

The number of permits issued last week by Building Superintendent Krause was ninety-nine. The improvements authorized amounted to $126,882, and were distributed as follows:

Ward.	No. of P'm'ts.	Val'tns.
First	12	$10,090

Near Orange and Burlington.

The many pretty pieces of architectural work that are to be found among the new residences of the city are by no means confined to the new subdivisions.

In this week's review will be found sketches of three new dwellings. One on the northeast corner of Burlington avenue and Orange street, a cement-and-plaster house that is now just about finished, was put up for A. L. Drew, after plans of Architects Preston & Seehorn. Another, on the east side of Burlington avenue, in the block just south, at No. 684, a handsome two-story frame structure with basement and attic, is now being finished up for C. S. Dodge, under his own supervision. The third, a pretty single-story cement-and-plaster structure, No. 615 Bonnie Brae street, stands on the street and block just west of the residence first described. It was recently erected for Isidore Raphael under the supervision of Architect S. T. Norton.

They are all provided with an interior finish, and arrangement that corresponds with the very pleasing exteriors, and the group tends to substantiate the contention that a fair share of attention is given to the details of architectural arrangement and effect in planning the new dwellings that are now being added to the attractions of the residence districts.

For Second and Olive.

The plans for a six-story and basement brick hotel building that is to be erected for Harry Jackins, on the southwest corner of Second and Olive streets, have been prepared by Architect A. L. Haley. The foundation is completed; work on the superstructure is expected to begin about March 1, and the building is to be finished in about six months.

A sketch, showing the Second-street frontage appears elsewhere in this review.

The lot on which it will stand is 60 feet on Second by 65 feet on Olive street, and the building will be 55x60 feet.

It will be typical of the Mission style of architecture, and will contain eighty guests' rooms, forty bath rooms, and the parlors, dining rooms, kitchens and administrative rooms usually found in a building of this class.

Storage rooms, and furnace rooms will be found in the basement. In the latter a circulating low pressure steam-heating plant will be installed.

Each room will be provided with radiators, hot and cold water, and similar modern conveniences, and a telephone will be placed in each suite. Elevators of the latest pattern will be a part of the equipment, and a sun parlor on the room, 22x30 feet, will be a feature of the establishment.

The building will contain the latest appliances and conveniences suitable to a family and commercial hotel, and it will cost about ...000.

For West First Street.

A twenty-four-room two-story frame apartment building to contain eight three-room flats is being put up by Theodore Wiesendanger on the north side of First street between Beaudry avenue and Boylston street. It is to be known as the Lucerne, and it commands a beautiful view of the surrounding country. On an adjoining lot, fronting on First street and about 183 feet west of Boylston street, a forty-two-room three-story frame apartment house that will contain suites of the same size for fourteen families, is being erected for the same owner. It is to be known as the Goleta, and will cost about $12,000.

At West Avery.

The R. O. Hickman subdivision at West Avery is soon to be placed upon the market by F. H. Brooks & Co. It will consist of nineteen acre lots; two, two-and-a-half acre lots; and fourteen five-acre lots. It is reported that water for irrigation has already been developed, and that a pumping plant with a forty-horse-power electric motor and a centrifugal pump with capacity sufficient to insure an abundant supply of water for this level land has been installed. West Avery is about eleven miles southwest of this city on the Los Angeles and Redondo electric line. The streets of the new tract are to be graded and improved at the expense of the present owners, and will be offered for sale, with water right, at from $150 to $350 per acre. The firm named reports recent sales of unimproved acreage in the West Avery tract adjoining as follows: Twenty acres, south side Electric street, 660 feet east of Chicago avenue, for M. N. Avery, trustee, to Monroe Markham, $2500; twenty acres, northeast corner Domingues street and Chicago avenue, for W. H. Stoll, to J. W. Kline of Covina, who buys for a home and will begin improving place at once, $2800.

Building Notes.

Work is in progress on the new sixty-room three-story frame hotel building that is to be put up for Lida J. Fountain by C. M. Graves, on the northwest corner of Fifty-sixth street and Central avenue. The roof was put on last Friday, and the building is to be completed within the next forty days.

Architect A. L. Haley has prepared plans for a two-story combination brick and stone dwelling that is to be put up for C. L. Loud at Pomona. Work of construction will begin at once, and the house be finished in the next ninety days. It will cost about $7300, and will be occupied by the owner.

R. S. Anderson has had plans prepared by the Ashby Building Company and let to it the contract for erecting for himself a modern frame cottage on the east side of Woodlawn avenue between Main street and Maple avenue. It is to be completed by May 1, and will be occupied by the owner as a home.

The contract for the electrical work on the S. W. Alexander block has been awarded to the Commercial Electrical Company.

Following plans for new buildings are taken from the Builder and Contractor:

Architect John Parkinson has prepared plans for Harry Gray of a five-story and basement modern store and office building 40x150 feet, to be built on the east side of Broadway between Third and Fourth streets.

Architects Morgan & Walls are taking bids for alterations to be made in the corner storeroom of the Hellman building at Second and Broadway. It will consist principally in the removal of the division wall and changing the store front of the adjoining room.

Architect Theodore A. Eisen has taken bids for the taking down and rebuilding of the structure known as the Colonial Flats, now located on the southwest corner of Eighth and Broadway. They will be removed and rebuilt on the northeast corner of Hill and Pico streets.

Architects Dennis & Farwell are preparing plans of a one-story and basement brick building 92x80 feet, to be built on the south side of West Seventh street between Hill and Grand avenue, for George E. Huntsberger and T. E. Mennel. The present one-story dwellings on the property are offered for sale.

Architect A. B. Benton is preparing plans of a six-room frame cottage to be built at Long Beach for Miss Elizabeth Fremont.

He is also preparing plans of a cottage hotel 40x70 feet, also a store building 25x70 feet. They will be of the mission style in adobe and concrete construction, and erected at Mecca.

He is also preparing plans of a two-story ten-room frame residence for Prof. Grenville C. Emery, to be built on Western avenue opposite Harvard School.

He is also preparing plans of a patio residence 76x75 feet, one-story, to contain seven rooms, to be built at Encinitas for Anthony Shaw.

He is also taking estimates for the steam fittings and furnishings of the kitchen department of the Jonathan Club to be installed in their new quarters in the Pacific Electric Railway building at Sixth and Main streets.

Architect A. M. Edelman is taking bids for a three-story brick and concrete store and rooming-house, to be built on the northeast corner of Commercial and Alameda streets, for Benjamin Kingsbaker.

He has also plans of a one-story brick store building to be built on the east side of Main street just north of Sixth for Isaacs Bros. & Co. It will be 57x100 feet and contain three storerooms.

He is also preparing plans for a modern theater building, to erected on the west side of Main street, between Third and Fourth streets, for J. A. Buckler of New York. The front portion will be three stories in height and the rear part two stories. It will be 70x170 feet and cover the entire lot. A general description of the building will be given later. Most of the work of construction will be done by the day.

SANTA ANA.

Architects Train & Williams of Los Angeles have prepared plans for the new City Hall to be erected at Santa Ana. It will be in the Renaissance style of architecture, of brick and stone construction and will cover a ground space of 58x90 feet. The foundation will be of concrete, red pressed-brick exterior with stone at the corners of the structure, plate-glass door lights, staff ornamentation, vestibule finished in white marble with mosaic tile flooring, galvanized-iron cornice and finials and tile roofing of the same material. The interior will contain the various offices for city officials and a large council chamber. The finishing throughout will be in Oregon pine. Entrance to the City Hall grounds will be through an ornamental wrought-iron gate.

STATE HOSPITAL BUILDING.

At a meeting of the managers of the Southern California State Hospital, held last Friday for the purpose of selecting plans and specifications for the proposed new central ward or administration building to be erected on the hospital grounds at Patton, the plans of Architects Hudson & Munsell of this city were adopted. The new building will be Romanesque in style, three stories in height, and cover a ground space of 72x94 feet. It will be thoroughly fireproof, brick and stone construction, with concrete foundation walls and slate roof. The interior will have oak finish and all modern conveniences. The amount appropriated for the work is $50,000.

MODERN SKYSCRAPERS.

Stood the Baltimore Fire Test Even in 2,800 Degrees of Heat—Makes Test Case.

[Fireproof Magazine:] Advance sheets of the Fireproof Magazine give the result of a visit by a body of experts, made to determine the effect of the recent fire here on the modern steel structure. The report says in part:

"It is found that the reports first sent out regarding the destruction of the skyscraper buildings of Baltimore were entirely erroneous, as they remain standing in every case practically intact, and requiring but a minimum of expense for repairs upon the structural parts.

"The committee gave most time to the Continental Trust Building, constructed of steel and tile, and considered the highest type of fireproof construction in Baltimore. The Continental stood in the very center of a raging furnace of heat and flame, and D. H. Burnham, the architect of the building, after walking upstairs from the first floor to the roof, sixteen stories above, reports that the steel, floor arches, main partitions, etc., with slight exceptions, remain perfectly intact. The engineers report that the steel construction is intact in every respect, and every part plumb.

"All the tile floor arches throughout the Continental are in perfect condition, the only apparent damage being the complete destruction of all the ornamental and marble work, wooden floor strips, glass and fixtures. Even the furring tile over the openings of the main windows on the banking floor, where the fire was fiercest, was found to be in perfect preservation, while the cast-iron mullions in these openings are wildly distorted by heat.

"Some idea of the terrific test to which this building was subjected may be had from observing that the typewriting machines on the various floors, which were found, were fused into molten masses. The experts estimate from this that the heat must have been approximately 2800 deg. Fahrenheit, as that temperature is required to melt cast iron.

"While the committee of experts was examining the structure of the Continental Building, the United Street Railways Company's officials were engaged in lowering over 2000 tons of silver money, which was found safely stored on the tenth floor."

FOR SALE—
R. E. COOPER UNION AVE. AND 11TH ST.
(No admission without card from us.)

Two-story, eight-room, modern, well equipped, first-class residence, in a first-class locality, at a low price. The house was built and first occupied three years ago, and valued then at $6000. The owner removed to Seattle a year ago, and now not expecting to have any more use for it, wishes us to dispose of it for him with as little delay as possible, for what it will bring. It really ought to fetch as much as it cost him, but if we can get $5000, or even $4500 and our commission, right off, the most of it cash, we are going to take it. Look at the house and make us an offer. There are eight rooms besides the reception hall, bathroom and cellar. The lot measures 60 feet on 11th st. and 175½ feet on Union ave. There is ample room on the south end of it for a second house, fronting Union. It is a valuable corner lot. The house is finished in the light woods, and the plumbing, hardware, lighting fixtures and all the equipments are of the very best. The rooms are large and well arranged. The outside appearance is distinctively artistic and pleasing. It doesn't look like every other house in the block, but has character, individuality, dignity, such as appeal always to people of refinement and good taste. To buy a lot like this and build such a house would cost, under the most favorable circumstances, at least $500 more than this is offered for, and there would be besides all the delay and trouble without any corresponding advantages, for this house is good enough for anybody who can get along with eight rooms. It is a model residence of the $5000 class.

FOR SALE—BY WALTER BROWN,
527 Bradbury Bldg.

$475—In the Arlington Heights section; 45x135; a north front lot, and inasmuch as it exactly faces the center of a 60-foot street, it is practically a corner. The fact that it is protected by a good building restriction and is within 300 feet of a car line, does not detract from its desirability.

$550—On W. Adams st. hill, 56x150; a superbly located east front lot, protected by a high-class building restriction, and with the street improvements all paid for.

$750—In the Kinney Heights section, near Arlington, and only two blocks north of W. Adams st.; a southeast corner, 50x150, to a 15-foot alley. The purchaser of this corner takes no chance as to the character of the building his next door neighbor will put up, for the next door neighbor has already built.

$950—On W. Adams st. hill, and only one block north of Adams st., a southeast corner, 50x150. The immediate erection of a beautiful home on the adjoining 100 feet of frontage means a quick increase in the price of this corner.

$1250—On W. Adams st. hill, a northwest corner, 100x150. This property is about the highest point of ground on the entire W. Adams st. hill. Its location is within two blocks of W. Adams st. itself, where inside frontage now commands $50 a foot. What is more surprising (when one considers the asking price,) is that the entire street improvements, including water, on the 100-foot frontage are already paid for. We know this is the lowest-priced corner of its size in the entire southwest.

$1700—In Arlington Heights, 100x140; a magnificent piece of east frontage on a 100-foot boulevard. The price includes the cost of street improvements, which are to be immediately commenced. The character of the improvements and the carefully-devised restrictions with which the property has been surrounded, make this a proposition well worth looking up.

$1850—In the Kinney Heights section, a northwest corner, near W. Adams st.; 100x150 to a 15-foot alley. Improvements on adjoining property will, we think, prove this to be an unusually good investment.

SANTA MONICA.
DESIRABLE PLACE TO LIVE.

Although nature has been so lavish in her ... ements to Santa Monica, yet the peo... have not been idle. Have you visited this busy little town ... monthly? When you do, don't forget to ... visit the store of A. M. Mr. Montgomery has a ... branch store at Ocean Park, and is doing ... a wonderfully large business. Remember, ... his goods and prices are right.

An American wrote to the editor of a Paris paper asking how he should pronounce the name of that paper. Was it "Pepys," "Do you," "Peppis, or Peeples, or Cheesy," or what? The editor answered politely, just the same saying that Pepys is pronounced Pepys.—Boston Herald.

Tokio Quietly and Calmly Notes End of Long Negotiations.

Prepares for War as for a Picnic—Mikado Receives Splendid Support from Japanese Press—How Call to Colors Was Answered—No Signs of Excitement—Fanatical Esprit de Corps.

BY OSCAR K. DAVIS.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE TO THE TIMES.]

Tokio, Feb. 9.—The war is on. After more than twenty-one years of negotiation with Russia about Korea, Japan, in her own phrase, "taken efficient action" to safeguard what she believes to be her essential interests. Her navy has gone to sea and is ready to meet the Russian fleet, if the best information obtainable can be relied upon, with orders to fight when they are met. Her army is mobilized. The men who constitute the peace force have either gone to points of concentration or are under to take transport for Corea, and operations as soon as the army is cleared the way, or are at the docks at their various divisional quarters awaiting the order to embark. Since Friday night, the 5th, many of the first reserve have been called to the colors. Even now there are ready for active service and Japan has use for immediately. This is why I wrote you ten days would occur before that letter could reach the Pacific. That prophecy has been fulfilled. But there was another which I cared more. Throughout the strenuous dash across the Asian continent to catch the steamer which brought me to Japan I carried in the back of my head the nagging fear that to miss the connection at San Francisco was not merely to have to wait for the next boat, but something far more—to miss one of the greatest stories of the age. My answer to the Japanese naval call of arms. I knew something of Japanese emotionalism and temperament, and I believed that when the period of uncertainty was ended, when the severe nervous strain of existence awaiting reached its climax in the order to fight, there would be such a response from the people as those at home should never forget. It was a not unnatural but erroneous attribution to them of some qualities dominant among us.

What would occur in New York when we began war with Russia! Flags, Stars and Stripes flaunt from doors and roofs and flag poles? Crowds gather in the streets and bands and bands play martial and inspiring music? Would signs of enthusiasm and excitement be manifest in the streets? And would the newspapers be filled with details of the preparations being made for troops, their mobilization and movement, all the grand rallying of the people in answer to the call?

NO SIGN OF EXCITEMENT.

I had thought something of that would happen here. There would be extraordinary exhibition of the feeling, cheers, flags, martial music, the display of popular excitement. But I was altogether wrong. What has been and most extraordinary quite the opposite of all I had fancied. Without noise or without haste or show of excitement, calmly, quietly, with the leisure of a picnic preparation, the response has been made to the summons long awaited and so dearly desired. What has been attended with a calm that is astounding. The nation is with the huge power which lies in the west and north. The people proud and determined, glad to fight and sure of themselves and their cause, yet with their ships at sea and troops on the move it was not until evening that they received the government the first explanation of why they are going to war and what they mean to win by force that could not get by peaceful means. The government of any other people on earth could do what the government has done and print a fragment of popular support almost the only complaint against the government is that it has not acted before. There is criticism in many quarters that it is not strong enough, the Cabinet is composed of popular men and there is fear that it has been weak and vacillating in the face of the gravest issues the nation has known for years, but back of the Cabinet stand the "Elder Statesmen," and now that decision to act there is no hesitating voice.

I have seen one of the most extraordinary scenes of this extraordinary people. It is the attitude of the Japanese that it is safe to say that few of them which has not seen which would make pages of reading. But they obey with the spirit of the law, they do not print any news movements of troops or ships of the warlike they are seen now on every side, they do not make even comment upon them; they do not solemnly record in the five Genro statesmen have had a conference, the time; that a Prime-audience with the Minister of War, the Minister of Marine. Not a word or a hint of this appeared at any of these papers, although it must be in most cases, they are read by their readers as to be printed.

THE CALL TO THE COLORS.

Last Friday evening, about 9 o'clock, the order of mobilization for the first of the reserves. They were to by morning at 8 o'clock and by that time they must have to join the colors. The announcement was accompanied by extraordinary tightening of the censorship, and there was issued forbidding the sending of code telegrams abroad from places and permitting only the great seaport towns only books were submitted for inspection and transmission messages offered. At the Englishmen and Americans officers in the transport left their marching orders. The train to Kobe was filled with those going toward one or other of the bases. Before morning there was in everyone's mouth reserves had been called out. Papers printed as calmly as other-repealed guesses about the reply, the time of its delivery, its probable character.

The morning showed vacancies in the employes of the hotels, in the banks, even the young men had been at the afternoon newspapers printed a brief paragraph saying that Baron Komura, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, had had a short conference with Baron de Rosen, the Russian Minister, and subsequently had been received for a few minutes by the Emperor. Late in the afternoon a man came to me in the hotel and took me aside to a dark corner, where one could not see or be seen. In a mysterious whisper, and with his finger on his lips, he said:

"Sh-h-h! The war is on."

But before that the reservists had begun to report at their gathering points. At various places throughout Tokio small signs had been hung out setting forth the fact that they were meeting points for soldiers. Men in uniform began to collect about them in little groups of six or a dozen. Here and there their friends gathered also, often many more in number than the soldiers. They stood around and laughed and joked as if it were all great fun, with no possibility of a more serious side.

Some of the newspapers began to show embryotic symptoms of excitement and issued extras about the size of auction dodgers. These were hawked through the streets by men who ran about ringing little bells and going as if their mission was to see who could cover the greatest distance before night without regard to the number of dodgers he disposed of. Some of them varied the performance by having two or three bells in a bunch, and one fellow had a string of them—hand bells fastened together by a cord. He had chosen them regardless of size and their discordant clangor carried farther than his cries.

DEPARTURE OF TROOPS.

All day on Sunday unusual activity was evident in Tokio. There were many persons in the streets, but all were coming or going and no crowds collected anywhere except about the gates of the barracks, where the soldiers were gathering. It was common talk that during the night several troop trains had moved out from the military station, which is not the one regularly used for passenger traffic. The men coming in were to take the places in the barracks vacated by those who had gone and to wait there until their turn came to go forward. It is the general supposition that the main base of the army will be at Hiroshima, down on the Inland Sea, as it was during the war with China. There the Emperor is likely to establish his headquarters, with the general staff, and about there most of the troops will be concentrated. From Ujina, a port near Hiroshima, and from Moji and Shimonoseki, the main embarkations of troops will probably take place. The troops now moving out are going to Hiroshima or into camp near there, to await their time to go aboard the transports.

During Sunday and yesterday the reservists came in steadily. Now and then there was a group of two or three, but for the most part they came singly. Each was in his uniform, and almost every one of them had a little bundle containing his civilian clothing or whatever it was that he wanted to take along. But only on very rare occasions did one of them carry his own bundle. That was an office reserved for the friends who flocked with him. There is no parading of the troops through the streets here when they go to war, no final march past their friends and relatives who throng the streets and cheer them on, no grand public leave-taking en masse. A different custom prevails. The friends of the reservists go with them to the barracks and at the big gate where all civilians are shut out they say good-by. If the soldier has anything to carry they lug it for him. Most of the men on Sunday and yesterday marched along stoically at the head of their little processions, now and then exchanging a joking word with those who tagged after them. Occasionally one walked with two or three friends and more formed a little column behind him. Occasionally one of the group carried a bamboo pole from which flaunted a long streamer bearing the name and address of the soldier, with any particulars there might be of previous valorous service. There was never a sign of weeping or of grief in it all. On the contrary it was a laughing, joyous ceremony. Yet there was a tremendous significance about it. For neither the men nor their friends believe that any of them will come back. They count their lives as forfeit to the empire, and they are proud and glad of it. There is no need of public display to stir up the enthusiasm of these people. It is already stirred to a wonderful depth. My room boy at the hotel disappeared on Saturday afternoon. Yesterday I asked the boy who took his place what had become of my boy.

"He gone see friend," was the reply.

"Is he a soldier?" I asked.

"No," said the boy; "too-old. His friend soldier, he go say good-by. He go Hokkaido. He come back two days."

LIKE THE FINAL PARTING.

Hokkaido is a three days' journey, there and back, but my boy must say good-by to his friend. Because the friend is not coming back from the war. It is a last good-by, the end of the friendship, and there is the same sanctity about this journey that there would be about going to the actual funeral of the friend.

So they came in the little groups, and the liveliest scene in all Tokio was at the barracks gates, where now and then the crowd neared 200 in number. Surely, though these people make no outward show of their feeling and their enthusiasm, it is none the less there, deep and effective. Perhaps if it were the policy of the government to parade the troops through the streets and to send them away from the main railroad stations in the daytime there would be large crowds to cheer them on, and to make public ado about their going; but since the government chooses to send them away secretly, to conceal its preparations with a care that makes them almost furtive, the people acquiesce without complaint.

They make no public demonstration, but they have thought long and deeply on what it all means. Their newspapers print scant information about what is going on, but the people know what the main question is and have made the quarrel theirs. There is no question of hanging back among them. Wherever they meet they talk it over, and the rickshaw coolie will discuss the situation quite as energetically as the educated professional man, if not as intelligently. And he has made up his mind to the sacrifice that may be necessary just as much as his more fortunate fellow-citizen. Only the other day in one of the little shops of Yokohama an American who speaks Japanese fluently overheard a group of them talking.

"It will cost a great lot of money," said one.

"Yes, and where is it coming from?" said another.

"The government will look out for that," was the comment of a third.

"We must all do what we can, I suppose," said the first, "but if the worst comes to worst we have many things in the country that we can sell. There is the great Daibutsu at Kamakura, and all the national art treasures. We can always find a good sale for them, and then after we have whipped the Russians and have got some of the cost of war back we can buy them back again."

That they were all in sober earnest showed only the more how determined the Japanese are for this war, and something of the sacrifice they will make to carry it on. Collectively they are a poor people, but they are as well extraordinarily frugal. They are rich in their capacity for saving, and this war seems likely to prove it.

"THEY WILL NOT COME BACK."

Down on the road to Kamakura an old woman, known to the foreigners as "Oyster Mary," keeps the roadhouse that was kept there by her father in the days when Perry came to Tokio Bay. On Saturday afternoon an American whom she has known for years dropped in for a cup of tea.

"Yes," she said, as she brought the tea to him, "the soldiers are getting out at last. We are going to fight. Just in this little road as far as the next corner, there are twelve. I know them all. The order came last night, and they have until tomorrow morning to say good-by to their friends. I could not sleep last night for thinking about them. It is very sad for them and their friends, for they will not come back. They have their wives and their mothers, and I thought about them all, and I am very sorry for them. But after all they are only one here and another there. It is not so much. But I was thinking of the Emperor and what sorrow it must be to him, for they are all his, and I could not sleep all night for thinking of how he must worry."

In the train coming up from Yokohama on Sunday afternoon the crowd in one of the third-class carriages began to talk about the war and of the calling out of the reserves.

"Well," said one old woman, "I have just said good-by to my grandson. I shall never see him again."

Two or three undertook to commiserate with her, and one said it was a pity.

"Pity!" cried the old woman; "no such thing! Do not waste pity on me. I am only proud to have a grandson to give to the Emperor. I know he will not come back, but I warned him not to dare to die until he had killed ten Russians or his soul would be whipped back by the god of hell."

There is a firm in Yokohama which employs a great many Japanese, having agencies in various parts of the country. One of its men returned only a short time ago from his year of service with the colors, and is therefore in the first reserve. The company found him a place as soon as his time was up, as it had done for several others who had been called out before. Just the other day the Yokohama office got a letter from him. It said that he wrote on behalf of himself and three of his mates who could not write English. They desired to thank the company for its considerate treatment of them and to express their regret at any inconvenience which their going away again might cause, but they expected to be summoned to the colors again very soon, and as this time it would be for war service, they did not expect to come back.

"But we are delighted," the letter went on, "to have the opportunity to represent the Emperor in fight with his enemy."

FANATICAL ESPRIT DE CORPS.

There in a nutshell is the key to the extraordinary patriotism of the Japanese. It is the teaching of the Shintoism that was their religion for hundreds of years. It is the tradition of the feudalism that gave them the Samurai and the Daimios, who of their own will and voluntarily gave up their great estates to restore isolated and retrograding Japan to a place among the nations of the world. If one wonders at the almost fanatical esprit de corps of the Japanese army he must remember that it is still officered by the men who made that memorable personal sacrifice, and the men of the line have ever before them the tradition of the soldier of the day when the fighting man was in a class by himself, far ahead of his fellow who bargained or toiled for a living, and it is their conceit now to live up to the glory of that day. Each soldier feels himself to be the individual champion of the Emperor, the personal representative of his sovereign, and the call to the colors is an opportunity greatly prized rather than a sacrifice to be regretted.

So, considered as a show, the mobilization has been a disappointment. Color, life, pageantry and blare of bands there has not been, but instead an unimagined and unimaginable exhibition far more extraordinary. In all Tokio I have seen but one flag flying, and that for only a brief time. Only one cheer have I heard, at a railroad station where a crowd of his townsmen came down to see an old officer start away. Here and there through the city sub-depots were opened where various articles of uniform or equipment were issued to the reservists, in one place shoes, in another blouses, in another trousers, in another caps, and so on. But not one of these places that I saw was marked by a flag or other indication of martial character, except that now and then the guard would be lounging about with their rifles leaning against the bamboo racks set out in front of the place.

JAPAN STATES HER CASE.

For several days there have been hints in the newspapers that the government might consider it advisable to issue a statement setting forth the course of the negotiations with Russia and urging strongly that it should be done. Yesterday afternoon notice was sent to the local newspapers and to the different correspondents of foreign papers here to come to the Foreign Office in the evening. The Japanese newspaper men went to the official residence of Baron Komura, the Foreign Minister, where he read to them the statement that was immediately cabled out in full. The same statement had already been given to the diplomatic representatives here of other governments, and by them sent to their respective capitals. Copies in English were given to the foreign correspondents, with the very significant remark that the telegraphic authorities had been instructed to facilitate in every way the transmission of messages concerning the document. Thus at last Japan made explanation of her cause. Japan made explanation of her cause. Japan made explanation of her cause.

Kentucky Turfman's Promising Three-Year-Olds.

Pulsus, Adbell and Robinhood are His Reliance.

Pathos in Present Life of Famous Old Horse.

[BY DIRECT WIRE TO THE TIMES.]

NEW YORK, Feb. 27.—[Exclusive Dispatch.] John E. Madden's reliance in the early eastern handicap for the older division will be the three-year-olds Pulsus, Adbell and Robinhood. Adbell is not named in the Brooklyn handicap, but he is in the Suburban and Brighton, and the other two are in all the races, which gives the Kentucky turfman a strong hand, in spite of the fact that he recently lost Aristocracy. Pulsus, the game little son of Topgallant-Glenhop, will carry 100 pounds in the first two specials, and 102 in the Brighton. Robinhood, though bred in the purple, did not have a chance to show his worth until the closing meeting at Jamaica last fall, when he won the first time out, beating a fair field, which included Rob Roy, Yellow Hammer and Gold Breaker. He is by Kingston-Belle of Maywood, and his allotment is 93 pounds in the first two races and 95 in the Brighton.

A HUMAN INCIDENT.

It was not so very long ago that the Park Row racing world waxed enthusiastic over the famous horse Dolando, familiarly known as "Beef and Beans Champion," but with the horse's retirement from the track came forgetfulness among those who cashed bets on his many successes. The game old horse is not far away, however, for his owner, Superintendent Dunphy of the Gravesend track, keps him busy every day pulling a dirt wagon over the race course, on which he captured many turf laurels. The other day Dolando got his wagon into a rut. The wheels stuck fast, but the horse with the same old bulldog pluck that made him illustrious on the turf, pulled the load out while the onlookers applauded him to the echo.

BRYAN CLAIMS INNOCENCE.
IN SWEET PEPPER MATTER.

[BY DIRECT WIRE TO THE TIMES.]

NEW ORLEANS, Feb. 27.—[Exclusive Dispatch. Steward Frank J. Bryan states that he knew nothing about the masquerading of another two-year-old for Sweet Pepper by Tommy Griffin in the paddock Friday until the horses were in the hands of the starter. Paddock Judge James Hall failed to report deception until too late to interfere with the betting operations of Griffin and his friends.

When the real Sweet Pepper was led into the paddock Judge Hall's assistant was informed that the wrong filly had been brought there in the first place. He notified Judge Hall, and the other filly was then led out, and Sweet Pepper's number taken off him and placed on the real Sweet Pepper. The mistake was made when the knowledge of this fact was not immediately communicated to the stewards.

WAS BAD DAY FOR FAVORITES.

JOE LESSER GAINS NECK VICTORY OVER NIGRETTE.

Many Oakland Books Lost as Winners Were Well Supported—Kenilworth Takes Lead in Handicap but Wearies and Finishes Third.

[BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS—P.M.]

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 27.—A $1000 handicap at a mile and fifty yards was the feature of the sport at Oakland this afternoon, and it resulted in a close finish, Joe Lesser gaining a neck victory over Nigrette. Kenilworth was a mild favorite, with Lord Melbourne a well-played second choice. Kenilworth went to the front at the start, and led for about six furlongs, when he grew weary. Nigrette then assumed command, and appeared to be winning. Bonner brought Joe Lesser up with a well-timed rush and in a drive won. Kenilworth was a distant third. Favorites fared badly during the afternoon, but many of the books lost, as the winners were well supported. Summary:

First race, five and a half furlongs, selling: Elliott, 111 (J. Daly,) 12 to 5, won; Egyptian Princess, 111 (Vanderbout,) 20 to 1, second; Clausus, 107 (J. Martin,) 9 to 2, third; time 1:04¼. Estey Listo, Blackthorn, Amaruna, Titus, Dr. Long and Narva G. finished as named.

Second race, four furlongs, purse: Bob Ragon, 106 (Bonner,) 5 to 1, won; Gloomy Gus, 107 (Bell,) 3 to 1, second; My Order, 106 (Travers,) 4 to 1, third; time 0:50¼. Saccharate, Golden Idol, Harvester and Steel Wire finished as named.

Six furlongs, selling: Pat Morrissey, 107 (Holbrook,) 2 to 1, won; Alice Carey, 100 (Travers,) 4 to 1, second; Pure Dale, 103 (J. T. Sheehan,) 8 to 1, third; time 1:16¼. Hellas, Goddess of Night, Dr. Sherman, The Miller, Myrtle H., Pearl Dive and Dandie Belle finished as named.

One mile and fifty yards, handicap, purse $1000: Joe Lesser, 99 (Bonner,) 5 to 1, won; Nigrette, 92 (Knapp,) 14 to 5, second; Kenilworth, 118 (Bee,) 9 to 5, third; time 1:46. Lord Melbourne and Daisy Green finished as named.

Seven furlongs, purse: Celebrant, 113 (H. Spencer,) 4 to 1, won; Judge, 118 (J. Daly,) 7 to 5, second; Soufriele, 106 (J. T. Sheehan,) 3 to 1, third; time 1:30. Solanus, Gateway and Sir Appleby finished as named.

One mile and seventy yards: Hainault, 107 (Travers,) 9 to 5, won; Forest King, 110 (J. Daly,) 9 to 5, second; Diderot, 107 (Buxton,) 16 to 5, third; time 1:48¼. Hainault also ran.

GREAT RUNNING PROMISED.
MANY HIGH-CLASS COURSERS.

[BY DIRECT WIRE TO THE TIMES.]

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 27.—[Exclusive Dispatch.] One of the most evenly drawn all-age events of the season is down for decision at Union Park tomorrow, and owing to the high class of the performers the big crowd is sure to enjoy most spectacular running. The long-odds book will come in for particularly heavy play, for at least fifty of sixty-four contestants are believed to have a chance to land the long end of the purse. The short-end possibilities under such circumstances are unusually numerous, and the talent, therefore, will have to be in rare form to pick the majority of the coursers.

COLUMBIA DEFEATS YALE.
IN FENCING TOURNAMENT.

[BY DIRECT WIRE TO THE TIMES.]

NEW YORK, Feb. 27.—[Exclusive Dispatch.] Columbia last night defeated Yale in the annual fencing tournament between those universities, held in Earl Hall. Of nine bouts Columbia won six, while Yale only captured three. The local Freshmen were steady and aggressive, and as the Yale men were not a bit loath to push the fighting, the bouts were fast and at times brilliant.

WALCOTT MEETS A TARTAR.
"BLACK BILL" JOLTS HIM.

[BY DIRECT WIRE TO THE TIMES.]

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 27.—[Exclusive Dispatch.] Joe Walcott met a Tartar in "Black Bill" of Merchantsville, N. J., at the Lennox Athletic Club last night. He had all the advantage over Walcott in height, reach and weight. The Barbados wonder found it difficult to get at his man properly and did not fight with his accustomed aggressiveness. The sixth and last round was of the hurricane order, and Walcott made a desperate effort to end the fight. His opponent stood off his rushes, and sent Walcott's head back several times with straight leads. The round ended in favor of "Black Bill!"

POOL POINTS.
GAME VERY GOOD NOW.

This week will be a busy one in pool circles. This table game was never before as popular as now, and several big pool events are now going on.

One of them is practically a world's championship match. John Kling and Joe Carney are two as capable cue-wielders as can be found anywhere in the pool world. Kling has been conceded the championship of this country by nearly everyone but Carney's admirers, who pick their favorite for the title.

Tomorrow night at the Lincoln rooms this pair will play the first of a series of games, 150 points a night, the first reaching 900 points to be declared the winner. The match has attracted attention all over the country and is by no means a local affair as some have imagined.

Another pool tournament has been in progress at the Lincoln rooms, in which Upton, Johnson and Frisco Seber now lead.

Joe Carney has been playing 100 points each afternoon with each of the contestants, the one making the best showing against Carney to be presented with a fine cue by the Brunswick-Balke-Collender Co. Carney has been letting the others down easy and has not been showing his true form in these matches.

GAME OF LIFE CATCHING ON.

Promise of Great Popularity for Lacrosse Here.

Teams from Canada Likely to be Competitors.

Cities, Colleges and Indian Schools Take Hold.

If you want to get "quick action and a run for your money," witness the next game of lacrosse which is played in Los Angeles. You will get golf, tennis, football and ping-pong all at one sitting, with the combined grace of fencing and the foot race, and if you are able to follow the ball from start to finish you have no need of the oculist. Lacrosse has been successfully introduced in Los Angeles and there is evidence of interest in the game in all this section.

A lacrosse club has been organized in Riverside, the Indian schools are taking it up, and several of the colleges of Southern California have contracted for equipment. The locals have agreed to a return bout with Santa Barbara for about the middle of next month and are already in correspondence with the San Francisco cracks looking to a contest. Almost any day, morning or afternoon, the enthusiasts may be found at Prager Park at practice. Lacrosse has come to stay.

REMARKABLE SHOWING.

"The showing made in the game between Los Angeles and Santa Barbara on Washington's Birthday was remarkable," said Charles A. Welsh, president of the New Westminster Lacrosse Club, yesterday evening. "You have better material and more of it for the Canadian game in this city than I have ever found on this Coast, and your climate is ideally adapted for the sport. Combination won for the Los Angeles boys, and with constant practice in short, quick passes, their game will be hard to beat. One of the principal errors of beginners is an inability to stay in their respective latitudes. They become over-anxious and run the full length of the field, and when the ball gets back to their latitudes they are not there to receive it. This mistake also leads to unnecessary bunching of the players, which detracts from the grace of the game. Your team is doing a lot of good work which, if kept up, will undoubtedly draw some of the Canadian teams down here in competition."

Lacrosse originated with the North American Indians, being especially suited to them because of its demands for fleetness of foot and darting from side to side. It has been changed but little, and it is easy to picture them now in their nakedness playing the game in an open place in the forest, where the ground was level and covered with the verdure of early spring. Two tribes would select an equal number of their best men and battle for supremacy, while the squaws and old men lined the arena and grunted approval at the winning plays. Two sticks were stuck in the ground at either end of the field, and then the ball was started from the middle, to be carried between the goals by means of a cross made of wood and buckskin and resembling a snow shoe with a handle on it. What a scramble as they knocked it out of each other's nets or passed back and forth as they ran! The sharp calls and signals, accompanied by the roll of the war kettle, made a stirring battle. And then came the feast of victory, followed by the pipe of peace.

BECOME POPULAR.

The game became the popular sport of the Canadians and has also met with much favor in England and parts of the United States. The rough skill of the Indians has been replaced by scientific play and well-constructed equipment, but has lost none of its charm. The skill of the game today depends principally on ability to handle the cross, pass and shoot the ball accurately, and block the other fellow, in checking, as it is called. Long runs are done away with by frequent transfer of the ball from one player to another, gradually advancing it into the enemy's territory, where it may be shot into the netted goal. The play calls for great physical endurance, accuracy of eye and cool, quick judgment, and is sport of a high order.

GOOD LOCAL PLAYERS.

Alf McKenzie, captain of the Los Angeles team, has played lacrosse for fourteen years, and will be able to pick a winning company from the excellent material which he has listed for practice. McAtee, who played home in the game on Washington's Birthday, has had more experience than any player in Southern California, and though he is a man in middle life, he handles himself like a young colt with an old head. He is always where most needed, and seldom misses a goal when he shoots for home. In Dr. Brennan the home team has a player who would be hard to discount. He is a large man and quick on his feet for his size. He wears glasses, but never seems to get them broken in the mix-ups. His stick handling is his strongest point, and he is good on the long throw. Porter at goal is no larger than a minute, but he is certainly all that's needed, a fact demonstrated by Santa Barbara's inability to make over two scores in the game. He guards his goal at all times, yet finds time to follow the ball in the rear of home every once in awhile. McLeod is a tall, broad-shouldered man, and is probably the fastest runner on the team. His stride is about six feet when he gets started, and he has a little loping movement that puzzles his checkers. Fine players are to be developed in the two Dwyer boys and Howard, Pierce, Irvine and Hayer will always be in the running. Mines is an all-around athlete, but does not carry quite enough weight for the game. Tupper is the right man for center, and generally gets the best of the draw.

FISH PROSPECTS.
SOME CROAKERS TAKEN.

Threatening rain will considerably reduce the beach crowd today and only a small part of the usual fishing turnout of Sunday will be on hand.

Croakers reappeared on several occasions during the week, and a few were caught by mid-weekers, some of the spotfins being of fair size, but they have been too scarce for much fun as yet. As a general thing rains spoil the croaker fishing for the few days immediately following.

Barracuda have been shipped in by the dozen this week and the market fishermen seem to be doing well. Most of the sea pickerel have probably been caught in nets, though a few have taken them with the jig. About the middle of next month is the time to look for barracuda trolling.

A few yellowfins are appearing in the bay, and fishermen expect the first of the China croaker run to come on at almost any time. It is a month earlier than they appeared last year.

BOXING BITS.
BROADWAY MATTER.

The status of the Broadway Club will probably be settled some time this week as Jim Scanlan, who is to be the tool for testing the ordinance will come up for a hearing before Judge Smith tomorrow. Just what will be done in the case it is, of course, impossible to forecast, but the club people say they are satisfied their position will be sustained.

Kid Williams has an engagement with Dewey, the negro, at San Bernardino March 1, and has already begun training for it. Williams expects to knock Dewey's block off handily enough, but may get quite a flirt in doing it.

BILL CURTIS WINS EASILY.

First Ascot Derby Now a Matter of History.

Formaster Never in the Race at Any Stage.

Mud Makes No Change in the Day's Results.

Galloping easily away from his field of three through a sloppy sea of mud, bedaubing those behind with gobs of sodden earth as he ran his nose first under the wire by four open lengths, Bill Curtis yesterday proved that he is truly a grand colt of true Derby class every bit as much of a racehorse, every ounce as good as his admirers have claimed; doing the mile and a half in 2:37 flat with 111 pounds up, and through a mushy, stick mess fit to defy anything but a veritable mud eater.

Derbies in the rain are not poetical things; the packed stand—the gay flutter of gaudy raiment in the boxes—the shrill shouts of applauding women and the sterner voices of packed lawns echoing forth the fierce satisfaction of a driving finish and successful bets are either absent altogether, or toned to a fraction of their fair day force. So it was at Ascot yesterday. Dark and lowering at noon, the day held forth only a promise of the ever welcome rain, and God Almighty charges no admission for that. The day's crowd, big though it was considering the conditions, was a third of the thousands who would have found their way to the track with fair weather.

Just how much difference the mud made in the running of the race is one of the things horsemen are not agreed about. Though Bill Curtis won in the mud, most well-informed authorities concede to him the honor of being many pounds the best horse in the race under any conditions of going, any attribute his really splendid victory not to the manifestations of racing luck through the sending of rain, but to his all-around superiority as a racehorse. Game as a bulldog, swift as a deer; strong as a lion and as quick, he has all the parts of a great stake horse, and the coin of California will be sent East to go opposite his name when the bugle blows at Washington Park for the American Derby in June.

The scratching of Fox Lake, Pat Bulger and Golden Mineral may have taken something from the first Ascot Derby, but few admit it. The four which started were the cream of the race.

It was well after 3 when the skirl of the bugler sailed forth the fleet quartette, and announced the preliminary parade to the Derby. Out of the paddock in single file they came; in the lead was Jim Blute's brown St. Blaise colt, Sais; J. Boland in the saddle. Right behind him, a handsome bay, proportioned like a greyhound, dark in color, minced his way along, almost as if realizing that the day of all days to a Derby colt was at hand. Perched upon his back sat the peerless Redfern, garbed in the red, blue cap, blue sash of Tommy Griffin. Elwood, the entry of Durnell, under little Hildebrande came next; last was the handsome, big, racy-looking chestnut son of Brutus, Formaster, Otto Wonderly in the saddle in the simple black and white combination of Boots & Hollenbeck.

The start was good; they broke like a shot at the half-post and around toward the stand the four swept, with Sais setting the pace, Bill Curtis second, Elwood third, and Formaster last. Sais cut out the running until the quarter had been passed; then Curtis moved up into the lead, taking command like a veteran. A length, two lengths; the farther he went the more he increased his lead, and as they rounded into the stretch he was running easily a length to the good. Inch by inch he drew away; the final efforts of Elwood and Formaster resulted in their placing as named, and with the hanging out of Bill Curtis's number by the judges, the first Derby of Ascot passed into racing history. At all times an odds-on favorite, Bill Curtis was well backed to win at 7 to 10. Formaster carried considerable play at average 3 to 1, but the ring was well informed on the capabilities of the winner, and quit well ahead of the race.

THAT ROSE CASE.
CRISP CHICAGO COMMENT.

Yost's method of getting crack athletes from California for Michigan has been disclosed by the Rose case, says the Chicago Tribune. Yost tells the athlete desired that he will be "well cared for if he chooses Michigan for his alma mater," and offers him a "lucrative position on the library staff." The Californian "accepts terms," as they say in the real professional field, and asks for transportation to Ann Arbor. On arrival he learns, according to Michigan dispatches, that Yost "has no authority to make such offers," that the "lucrative position" specified pays the munificent sum of "20 cents a week," and that the fraternity to which he was "pledged" before arrival does not exist. By this time the athlete is over 2000 miles from home, Yost won't give him transportation to return, of course, and, rather than walk, he remains until he can earn enough 20 cents to pay his car fare to California. That requires several years, and, naturally, the athlete, being a sportsman, is willing to compete on Michigan's "varsity teams in the interim. It is a great scheme and is wholly within the letter of the college conference rules, but any other scheme would smell no worse than does the Rose case.

DOPED DOGS.
TROUBLE UP NORTH.

Frank Jones's celebrated courser Harlean Gladys collapsed on the field at Ingleside Coursing Park and was carried in a dying condition to the kennels. The opinion of nine out of ten of the spectators was that the dog had been doped, and circumstances warranted the suspicion, says the San Francisco Call.

Locally the coursing game is down and out, and without intention to say ill of the dead, it is well. No sport is so rotten—dog fighting, though brutal, is at least more honest.

CHICAGO TEAM HERE SOON.

Ball Tossers Will Arrive Week from Tomorrow.

First Game With Angelenos Middle of March.

Will Meet Other Coast Teams During the Trip.

[BY DIRECT WIRE TO THE TIMES.]

CHICAGO, Feb. 27.—[Exclusive Dispatch.] The Chicago National League baseball club, seventeen strong, will invade Los Angeles a week from Monday. The local club leaves here next Thursday for their anual spring training trip, which for the past two years has been to the Pacific Coast. The Chicago club this year is considered even stronger than last year, when the team made a hard fight for the league honors, and baseball fans at Los Angeles will be furnished with ten days of first-class baseball.

Leaving here Thursday, the party will arrive in Los Angeles on the following Monday. The first week will be spent in practice work to allow the men to limber up after the winter of inactivity. The last few days of the week will probably be spent playing games between the regulars and the scrubs, reinforced by members of the Los Angeles team. The first game of the year played by the Chicago team will take place March 12, when it is scheduled to meet the Los Angeles team.

OTHER GAMES.

Another game will be played with the same team on the following day, when the Chicagoans will end their stand in that city. March 14 and 15 games will be played with Fresno and Bakersfield at those cities. March 16 to 20 will be spent at San Francisco with the San Francisco and Oakland teams as opponents. The next day the team will start eastward. Games will be played on the homeward journey at Ogden, Salt Lake, Denver and Omaha.

Capt. Chance and Fielder McCarty are already at Los Angeles, and the other players will leave here in a body. Those to make the trip are Kling and O'Neill, catchers; Weimer, Wicker, Lundgren, Brown, Corridon and Briggs, pitchers; Evers, second base, Casey, third base; Tinker, shortstop; Slagle and Davy Jones, fielders, and Howard and Moriarty, utility men. Manager Heise, with his wife, will join the team from Texas, where he has been spending the winter. The president will not return to Los Angeles on account of his business.

CLARKE AT PRINCETON.

TO COACH COLLEGE SQUAD.

[BY DIRECT WIRE TO THE TIMES.]

PRINCETON (N. J.) Feb. 27.—[Exclusive Dispatch.] Fred Clarke, manager and captain of the Pittsburgh National League baseball team, who recently accepted a position as coach of the Princeton team, has arrived in town, and with Head Coach Hillebrant and Capt. Stevens, will take charge of the baseball squad.

FIGHTERS SHOW BAD BLOOD.

CORBETT AND BRITT WILL PUT UP HURRICANE BATTLE.

Personal Feeling Between the Two Boxers Causes Sportdom to Smack Its Lips in Anticipation of Rough House—Walcott Meets Tartar.

[BY DIRECT WIRE TO THE TIMES.]

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 27.—[Exclusive Dispatch.] Bad feeling is beginning to develop between Young Corbett and Jimmy Britt, and the sporting element is smacking its lips over the prospect of witnessing a hurricane battle between the pair when they clash before the Hayes Valley Club on the night of March 25. There is blood in Young Corbett's eye over the failure of sportdom to wax warm over his impending struggle with Dave Sullivan. Britt's friends are gloating over the prospect of Young Corbett reaping a dead harvest of what they term the champion's folly in signing to meet Sullivan at such an inopportune time. The Corbett contingent claims Jimmy is sore because the champion got the better of terms, a claim which the Britt people fail to see.

The champion accuses Britt of knocking the Corbett-Sullivan show, to which charge the South Side idol replies:

"The show knocks itself."

As a matter of fact, Britt has not said much around town concerning the Corbett-Sullivan battle. He is naturally piqued at what he considers the sharp practice of Young Corbett in signing with the Yosemite Club, thus jeopardizing the big match. Corbett offers to bet $5000 that Sullivan will make a better showing against him than Britt will, but as the former and his brother-manager look upon this offer as a bid to boost the Sullivan-Corbett bout, they will pay no attention to the offer. Summing it all up, it looks as if both boxers were putting themselves in Comanche fighting temper for the fray.

LAST RACE LOST.

THE ABBOT IS DEAD.

The Abbot, the famous trotter owned by John J. Scannell, is dead at the Scannell stock farm at Fishkill, after an illness of only two days. The trotter had a mark of 2:03¼, made at Terre Haute, Ind., September 25, 1900, when he won a purse hung up for the trotter which should beat 2:04.

The Abbot was foaled in 1893 at the Hamlin stud in East Aurora. His sire was Chimes and dam Nettie King (2:20¼). In November, 1900, Mr. Scannell, then Fire Commissioner, paid $24,500 for The Abbot at the auction sale in Madison Square Garden. In 1902 The Abbot was matched with Thomas W. Lawson's Boralma for a race for $5000 a side, but Boralma's illness prevented the race.

Ed Geers was The Abbot's trainer and driver. It is conceded that The Abbot's best performance was in August, 1901, when Cresceus beat him. The first heat was trotted in 2:03¼, the fastest time ever made in a trotting race.

Scannell was in New York and did not even know the horse was sick. He went to the farm immediately and arranged to have the horse buried on the farm beneath a monument inscribed with his time, 2:03¼, age and owner.

It is said Scannell recently gave a man $1400 to have the horse insured in London for $20,000, but that the man kept the money and has not been seen since. Scannell is said to have been negotiating for another policy, but it had not been secured. He said he recently refused an offer of $40,000 for the horse from E. E. Smathers.

HEAVY ENTRY IN CHICAGO DERBY.

PICK OF WESTERN THREE-YEAR-OLDS TO START.

Many Horses Now at Ascot Park to Go in Chicago Jockey Club's Classic—Ten Thousand Dollars of Added Money.

Turfmen have taken kindly to the renewal of the Chicago Derby to be run at Hawthorne race track May 21, says the Record-Herald. In point of entries it does not rank with the American Derby of last year, but the pick of western three-year-olds, with a number of eastern candidates, have been nominated for the event. The entries for the season's racing have been issued by Manager Harry Kuhl of the Chicago Jockey Club, and show a total of eighty nominations for the Chicago Derby, eighty-one for the Northern Handicap, and the same number for the Monadnock Stakes, which was one of the important stake features last year, but for which the conditions have been changed this year.

COYOTE'S PACE LEAVES DOG.

SWIFTEST RUNNER IN WORLD UP TO MILE OR MORE.

"Wolf" of California Almost Beyond Catching, and a Shrewd and Sure Hunter of Jack Rabbits and Even Larger Game.

There is no animal in the world that can outrun a coyote for any distance up to a mile or a little over. There are hounds in Southern California that can catch a coyote, no question about that, but they require from two to ten miles to "wind" him in first.

So swift a runner is the coyote that he picks up the prairie jack rabbit without half trying, and in days of their plenitude in the desert counties even the fleet-footed antelope was not safe from packs of the little gray dogs. In such times the coyotes would hunt in bunches of from five to twenty-five, and, upon sighting a band of pronghorns they would gradually draw up a cordon around the herd until they were close enough to pick out a weakling or a kid. If there were none such the wolves took their chances with an adult, and generally got him, too. Mile after mile they would run him until the leaders of the pack caught up with him. It was then short work, for their sharp teeth to hamstring their quarry and he was helpless. Today about the only game left to the coyote is the jack rabbit, and the things the wolves do to these orchard pests are a plenty, as Fresno county found out not so very long ago, when she put a bounty on coyote scalps.

Coyotes in Southern California, where they are not so plentiful as farther north, usually hunt the jacks in pairs, and no amount of doubling and twisting can save the rabbit. The way the average coyote will make fools of a pack of the best California hounds is not a matter of much joy to dog men. Though now and then a wolf falls a victim to the dogs, the sport is so profitless that the hounds are generally called off when their owner thinks they have struck a coyote trail. A brace of Russian boarhounds were tried in Orange county a few years ago, but the wolf had left them so far at the end of the first mile that there was nothing doing.

A coyote's best pace is an indescribable gait; something between a trot and the lope of a Kentucky thoroughbred, but he can eat up country with it in a way as surprising to the tenderfoot hunter as it is to his dog.

The wise farmer will not allow you to hunt coyotes on his place on account of the good they do him by killing off the ground squirrels and rabbits. A coyote that has been shot at, but not touched, and then had time enough to "get up steam" is one of the most trying marks the rifle shooter, be he ever so expert, can pull down on. The chances are he will not get one of three he sees over the rifle sights.

Tom Hughes Traded.

Pitcher Tom Hughes, who was one of the star twirlers on the Boston world's champions last season, has been traded to the Greater New York Club by the Boston management in exchange for Jesse Tannehill. It has been rumored that eventually Hughes may be traded to Detroit in exchange for Pitcher Mullin, but that deal has not been accomplished as yet.

Joe Yeager will not play the races in Chicago this summer. This will go pretty hard on the cipher editor.

Two Little Jockeys up at Ascot Park.

Eyes of the racing world, locally and elsewhere, have been on little Eugene Hildebrand constantly of late and the conviction is rapidly forming that Joe Yeager's tiny protege is the most promising lightweight jockey now in sight.

Hildebrand has thus far escaped the principal bane of the average successful jockey—a swelling of the head. A careful inspection of his cranium would show no abnormal or unwarranted enlargement. Would the same might be said of some other riders now at the track. The little fellow takes the best care of himself, and bids fair to dodge the primrose path over which so many clever saddle pilots go the route to oblivion. His riding is a finished article, and Yeager has had many lucrative chances to part with the boy's services, but he feels Hildebrand is worth as much to him as anybody else so long as he is in the racing business as an owner.

Hildebrand, who, contrary to the belief of a few local horsemen, is no relation to "Pudge" Hildebrand, the ball player, has been riding only about a year and a half and is still a boy in his early teens. His following at the race track is already larger than that of any other jockey now accepting mounts here, with the possible exception of Otto Wonderly, and his admirers will note with unusual interest Hildebrand's career upon the turf this season.

Little Joe Lewis is another boy whose work has been a distinct feature of the present racing season at Ascot Park. He, too, can do very light weights, and his standing in the percentage list is a high one. Lewis has shown real ability in getting away from the barrier, seems to be a good judges of pace, and has already proved himself a hard finisher. There are two Lewis boys riding at Ascot, brothers, N. Lewis has not yet shown the ability of the other, if it is inherent in him.

THE PRESIDENT WILL STOP ELK SLAUGHTER.

[BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS—A.M.]

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27.—An effort is to be made by President Roosevelt to prevent the wanton destruction of elk in this country. Congress, probably informally, will be asked to enact stringent laws looking to the preservation of the great animals. Representative Humphrey and Allan Weir of Washington discussed with the President today the slaughter of what is known as the Roosevelt elk in the Olympian Mountains of Washington. State Game Wardens have found carcasses very recently of eleven elk in one place and eight in another. All had been killed illegally, merely for two teeth in each animal, which are used as a sign of the order of Elks. The carcasses remained where they fell.

AMERICANS IN BENNETT RACE.

SPEED MEN WILL COMPETE FOR CUP IN GERMANY.

Automobile Club of America Arranging Series of Try-outs to be Held at Daytona on Beach—Special Care Being Built.

The inability of the Kaiser to be present at the Gordon Bennett cup races in July has caused those in charge of the event to decide to hold it one month earlier. The race will be run on June 17 instead of in July.

The start will be made at Kastell Saalburg and the route leads from there through Wehrheim, Usingen, Gravenswelsbach, Weilburg, Altendorf, Neckholzhausen, Obertiefenbach, Limburg, Kerberg, Neuhof, Idstein, Esch, Glashutten, Konigstein, Oberursel, Oberstetten and Dornholzhausen.

The racing committee of the A.C.A. has accepted for the preliminary trials the entries of Alden Sampson II of Pittsfield, Mass.; L. H. Klttredge of Cleveland, O., and Peter Cooper Hewitt of Trenton, N. J. The German Automobile Club has been cabled, making entry of three cars for the Gordon Bennett race. The preliminary trials and inspection of cars will be made at least six weeks prior to the date of the race.

The Automobile Club of America has issued the following statement concerning American entries:

"The Gordon Bennett race will be held in Germany June 17. Contestants for places on the American team have been notified to report with their cars at the Automobile Club of America April 15 at 10 o'clock in the morning, non-appearance to render contestants subject to forfeiture of their right to compete for a place on the team. The cars will be inspected by the Technical Committee of the club. If such an inspection be satisfactory contestants will proceed with their cars to the Ormond and Daytona beach, Florida, to be there thoroughly tested and tried out, such contests to begin approximately on April 16, but subject to change one day earlier or later, dependent upon sailing dates of Clyde line steamers from New York to Jacksonville. All expenses during contests and inspections to be borne by contestants. Contestants have been requested to advise the racing committee at once as to the state of completion of their respective cars."

TOO MUCH BUZZ.

LADY AND THE AUTO.

He knew very little about automobiles, but he managed to inveigle the manager of a garage into letting him have a gasoline car on hire for an afternoon. With a friend of the fair sex he set off, managing to start and steer the car in a creditable manner.

About two hours later a telephone message was received at the garage to the effect that something was wrong with the car, and that it should be sent for to a well-known house. A mechanic was put in a car, a coil of rope thrown in and sent off, with instructions to tow the car home if it could not be put to rights quickly. Arrived at the house, the amateur motorist was found, and he stated that the machine could not be started.

A few abortive efforts to start the engine by turning the crank were made, and then an investigation was begun. Almost the first thing that came to light was that the vibrater was screwed down so it would not vibrate.

"How did this happen?" asked the mechanic impatiently.

"Why, the buzzing made the young lady nervous, and I screwed it down," was the reply, accompanied by a rather sickly smile.

The disgusted mechanic's remarks are better left unrecorded.

VON DER AHE TALE

"GENTLEMENS AND—FELLERS."

When Comiskey was copping the pennant for Von der Abe each year "Commie" was in absolute power on the field, but when the boys got "off" Chris called them up for a little heart-to-heart talk.

On one occasion when Chris had found out about his players carousing at night, when they were supposed to be in bed, he called them up on the carpet and in his characteristic way laid down the law. In conclusion he said:

"Now, I know about you fellers chasing around nights and getting full of beer. If this ain't stopped you won't have any salary coming. Remember I ain't mentioning any names or pointing any fingers, but—Billy Gleason, you mind out."

A ball player was only a ball player to Chris, and he always had that idea before him. He demonstrated that one day, just before the season started when the directors of the club and the players assembled for a little chat. Chris was down for the opening address. On one side of him were the directors, and opposite sat the players. Bowing first to the directors and then to the players, the president began:

"Gentlemens" (to the directors) "and fellers."

AUTO RACING.

FINAL DASH ADVOCATED.

Automobile racing is destined to disappear or be attended only by a few enthusiasts unless the plan is adopted of having real contests with a final dash to the finishing line, says a sporting writer. This is done in all other forms of racea. Horses are not started off at a full tilt and kept at it, nor are foot runners or bicyclists. It is true that it is not necessary to husband the strength of an engine as it is that of a horse or a man, but the plan of not trying to run away, but to try to make the main part of a race consist of the final dash of a furlong or two, is one that would insure popularity for automobile racing, as it has for racing of other forms.

Any sport in which the dominating sentiment of the contestants from the start is manifestly a fear that their steeds may not last until the finish of the race hardly has the element of permanency.

Furthermore, if automobile racing is to seek public patronage, the people must be given what they want.

MORLEY WILL KEEP DILLON.

Decides to Play Captain, and Await Outcome.

Considers Possession Nine Points of the Law.

General Sentiment That Raw Deal Was Uncovered.

"Possession is nine points of the law and I have Frank Dillon," said Manager Morley last night. "What is more I intend to keep him and expect to play him this season.

"Any fair-minded person conversant with the facts will concede that I have the best of the argument. Dillon's priority of contract with the Los Angeles Baseball Club has already been established by an affidavit and Mr. Johnson has sustained my position. I consider the best thing for me to do is to play the man and let them take further action. What Hanlon or the National Association will do next I do not know; I think we have won our fight," says Morley.

"I have just finished writing some letters bearing upon the matter and making my position more plain to those interested in the matter. I think I have been treated very badly in this Dillon business and am pretty well satisfied that an agreement was reached by Hanlon with those who voted for the giving up of Dillon before Hanlon ever left to go East. I have spent as much money and time in fighting for the Pacific Coast League as anyone in it, and a great deal more than some now in the ranks. No, I don't think there was any selling out; I do think however, that Hanlon pulled the wool over the eyes of Harris, Bert and the rest, and caused them to take an action that they would never have taken otherwise.

"There will be some further developments in this matter in the league. But as far as I am concerned, I intend to play Frank Dillon this season."

Among baseball men it is conceded that Morley has the most sensible stand and the through the Dillon affair. In of his refusing to give up the It is hard to see what effective could be brought to bear The league could not affect Los Angeles out; any action cing the investments of his associates could be by injunction, and it now if the big captain was a initial sack this season.

Everything points to a deal to throw down Morley Los Angeles club, by Dillon as a peace offering already won, it is claimed, between northern managers ley; a fear he is making strong for the league, and desire on the part of Harris associates to reduce salaries the expense of cheapening western baseball have had in the job. Hanlon and Harris cooked it up after the ing had settled matters, finally.

One of the best-known a popular business man to be incognito, summed the yesterday by saying:

"We—that is the fans—have share for supporting the Coast and we think we won for it against the Pacific Nationals this was through sympathy; cause the Coast League has best baseball in California. Pacific National League baseball it might have been so. So, while we admit it was largely through love that we money at Chutes Park and Prager Park, we feel nevertheless we are entitled to some consideration at the hands of the magnates. fans have seen real baseball not stand for an inferior article for the reduction of salaries have been too high their themselves, and a reasonable be accepted all along the line to begin hedging by sending cream of the league and cheapening the quality of here is intolerable; a move public will not stand for, and feel compelled to patronize. tional Association is all right the Coast League must discard nor caliber in order to attract let us have war again by all means.

Looloo Line-up for the Season Complete.

With the arrival of Second Baseman Tim Flood from Brooklyn, and Outfielder Curtis H. Bernard from Toledo, the Looloo line-up for 1904 is completed. Now nothing remains but an adjustment of the Dillon matter, which may or may not be arrived at.

Flood, who played with the Sacramento team the latter part of the first season after Los Angeles became a member of the league, is well known to the older fans in this city, and Bernard is already well appreciated on his record. Both have arrived in very fair shape to start their work, neither being far from his playing weight now; in fact, Bernard today weighs 162 pounds, which is the figure he plays at.

The new players have already journeyed to Chutes Park and have done a little light work. Flood is well acquainted with California conditions, but Bernard, who is now on his first trip to the Coast, is in love with the climate and can talk of nothing else. He is already worrying about how to go East to study medicine after the season in March. The fact that "Doc" Newton has come to Los Angeles for some time employed springs looking the picture of health in preference to English and is as full of life and ambition, because English trainers ever. WORLD'S GREAT TURF WINNERS.

Africander Leads All Those Now Racing.

Domino's Grand Record Still Stands Unbeaten.

Isinglass Leads All the High English Winners.

An interesting compilation has emanated from a famous Lexington, Ky., turf authority covering the world's biggest money winners on the running turf. The main tables are supplemented with a table covering the biggest money winners now on the turf which will race for further honors in 1904. America has not had an addition to her winners of $100,000 or over since Sir Walter entered the charmed circle several years back, but there are now, as will be seen by this compilation, several horses in training this season that, with a little racing luck, can reach this high standard of turf excellency. Of the fifteen big winners below given, which seem sure starters again in 1904, all but Advance Guard and Golden Heels raced last year. At present every indication points to these old veterans standing training this year, and the quality of each is of such high grade that one or the other may reach the $100,000 line before the new rivals in the field, which developed during the past season. The list follows:

Though a decade has elapsed since the dead Domino began his career on the turf, he is still the premier winning horse of America, and his marvelous record in this respect looks safe for years to come. But sixteen horses bred in America have won as much as $100,000, or over, and one of this number, the winner of the English Derby and St. Leger, Iroquois, secured his huge earnings on foreign soil. A list of these stars and their turf records follow:

England's great list of huge winners has been increased by three horses in the last few years, Epsom Lad, Scepter and Rock Sand winner of the Derby, St. Leger, and the Two Thousand Guineas in 1903, all being way up now as money winners on the turf. Scepter now ranks ranks as the biggest money winner among mares, having at last taken down the record of the sensational La Fleche. A comparison of these tables shows we are still behind England in this respect, her array of winners of $100,000 and over totaling twenty-seven to America's sixteen. Gladiateur and Rayon D'Or in England's table were French bred horses, but earned the bulk of their winnings on the English turf. On the other hand, but by winning the Grand Prix in France, Robert the Devil and Cremorne would not figure in this compilation of enormous money winners. The list follows;

KANSAS CITY MEET.

NEW JOCKEY CLUB'S FIRST.

The new Kansas City Jockey Club is ambitious to make its first meeting, April 30 to May 21, high class, and seeks the support of the principal stables racing in California. It is a club composed of 200 prominent business men of Kansas City.

Ten stakes are to be run in nineteen days of racing at the new Elm Ridge race course, at a cost of $200,000 and on the alternate days when there are no stake races, feature events will be in the programme book. Even the selling races will have no purse of less than $500, and everything is being done to attract the best horses. The ten stakes will aggregate in value close to $35,000, the least valuable being a steeplechase stake with $1500 added. Jumping races will be put on if there are sufficient horses on hand to warrant.

M. N. Macfarlan, of Memphis, acting secretary for the new Kansas City Jockey Club, already has received entries from prominent stables, such as Capt. Brown's, Sam Hildreth's, Fred Cook's, and Charlie Ellison's. Among the stakes, for which entries will close Tuesday are three for two-year-olds and another beside the Derby for three-year-olds. But next to the Derby the most valuable will be the $5000 Elm Ridge handicap for three-year-olds and upward at a mile and a furlong.

The officials of the meeting will be Francis Trevelyan, presiding judge; N. M. Macfarlan, associate judge and handicapper; E. G. B. Haymon, paddock and patrol judge; Richard Dwyer, starter.

Intercollegiate Meet Postponed.

The intercollegiate field day, which was to have taken place at Fiesta Park yesterday afternoon between the track teams of the University of Southern California and Pomona College, was postponed on account of the rain. A date has not yet been decided upon, but the meet will probably take place within two or three weeks, and the coaches are confident that the additional practice which the athletes will get will assure a more closely-contested meet.

This Baseball Nine Seeks Championship Pennant.

With an enthusiastic student body and a well-drilled team of experienced players, the Santa Ana High School has entered the contest this year with a determination to win the Southern California interscholastic baseball pennant. In the picture of the team presented in the accompanying cut, reading from left to right beginning with the lower row, the players are: Hilliard, shortstop; Bissel, second base; McPherson, first base and captain; Obarr, center field; Skiles, right field; R. Spurgeon, catcher; Ross, third base; W. Spurgeon pitcher; Slayback, left field; Potter, manager. McPherson, the captain, was with last year's team and exhibits good head work in holding the players down to consistent practice. W. Spurgeon, who played last year in the field, pitches this year, and his brother, "Bob," a good base runner and heavy hitter, is behind the bat. Hilliard at short was one of the spectacular players last year. The second and third basemen are good infielders. Coleman, the star pitcher, who was with last year's team, and was responsible for much of its good work, is expected to be with this season's nine for most of the games. Games already played with the Orange High School, the Peatlands and other teams have proved easy victories for the High School aggregation, and Manager Potter is arranging a schedule of meets with the High School nines of Southern California.

A track meet for the five high schools of Orange county is contemplated for March or April. Plans are also on foot for the reorganization of the girls' basket-ball team, which last year had a record of continuous victories over every team it met.

Interest in all branches of school athletics has been remarkably stimulated by the securing of Athletic Park as high-school recreation and athletic-meet grounds. This park, fenced in and complete with football grounds, baseball diamond and grand stands, has been leased for the benefit of the school athletes for a term of three years and will be used for all meets held in Santa Ana. It is said to be the most adequate field possessed by any high school in Southern California for athletic purposes.

FATHER DALY SELLS WALSH.

J. L. HOLLAND PAYS LARGE SUM FOR BOY'S SERVICES.

Jockey Whose Riding at Ascot Won High Approval Will Ride Extensive Stable of Young Horses in Eastern Stakes Next Summer.

Jockey E. Walsh, whose consistent riding attracted close attention and much favorable comment at Ascot Park during the earlier months of the present racing season, is now a $14,000 boy himself—in fact, a notch higher.

Walsh will ride for J. L. Holland of New York this year. Holland has just paid "Father Bill" Daly $12,500 for a three years' contract on the boy's services as a rider. Mr. Holland has an extensive and promising string of two and three-year-olds now at Gravesend, mostly of stake class, and it is to ride these to victory that he has engaged little Walsh.

H. T. Griffin some time ago offered Daly $7500 for the contract secured by Mr. Holland, but was refused, as Daly was firmly convinced he has one of the best riders in the country and was not prepared to part with him for less than what he thought Walsh's services worth.

An interesting feature of the deal is that Holland walked out of Daly's cottage in Brighton Beach, N. Y., with the contract just as A. L. Aste knocked at the door to get it. In another month, had Walsh repeated his Ascot successes at New Orleans, competition for his services might have been even more keen.

Now that he is in Holland's employ, Walsh will leave New Orleans at once for Gravesend, where he will exercise his owner's string. Mr. Holland's colors will be prominent in all the stakes to be run on the eastern tracks this summer, and, Walsh will have plenty of opportunity to show what is in him.

Walsh received his early training in a school that is noted for having turned out some of the best jockeys American racing has ever seen. "Father Bill" Daly, who taught the boy, has brought out such riders as McLaughlin, "Snapper" Garrison and Winnie O'Connor. Daly employs strict methods with the boys, whom he gives religion with one hand and a club with the other.

Miles, now at Ascot, is another Daly protegé, who thus far has not shown the ability that Walsh has. Holland's latest acquisition has been consistently improving during the last three years. His salary remains to be fixed; Holland bought only the contract. It will probably be a large sum.

The high schools that will participate, and the number of men each will send, according to arrangements, are Los Angeles, 15 men; Pasadena, 10; Pomona, 10; Santa Paula, 12; San Diego, 10; Corona, 10; Riverside, 10; Santa Ana, 10; Anaheim, 10; Redlands, 10; Citrus Union, Glendora, 8. Throop Polytechnic Institute, Pasadena, will send 15 men; St. John's School, San Gabriel, 8; Harvard School, Los Angeles, 15.

Bleachers, with seating capacity of 1000 persons, are being prepared. They will be made portable, and thus available for sporting events in Claremont and at Pomona College at other times.

A few of the teams will be obliged to remain over night in Claremont—the San Diego, Anaheim, Santa Ana and Santa Paula teams. Preparation is made for their entertainment and amusement for the evening will be provided.

Custer School Wins.

The baseball team of the Custer-avenue School defeated the Union-avenue School nine, 10 to 0 yesterday. Reynolds and Terrel, Custer-avenue battery, struck out fourteen men, allowing only two hits.

The Best Results Are Obtained by the Best Methods

My Treatment and Methods of Application Get at the "Exact Cause."

By my method I'm enabled to reach the exact condition, whether it be acute or chronic. By seeing and knowing, the results are sure to follow, for when I commence I will know just what to do and how to do it to give you the quickest permanent cure. Improvement is noted in each case as I search out the cause and make the necessary application, and it is not temporary, either, but the beginning of a change which will be lasting. I invariably obtain prompt and satisfactory results. My personal attention to each individual case enables me to note changes and take advantage of what others guess at or neglect, or still worse, leave to right itself. Nature won't always patch up and do what is left undone. I apply rational and natural treatment and assist Nature when Nature fails to assist herself.

Functional Decline

Termed Weakness by Some

I am positive the treatment I employ in the cure of this derangement is the most potent, rational, direct and certain whereby functional activity of the parts can be restored. Many men suffering from the condition will find the cause directly traceable to the reproductive system.

Varicocele

Many men have treated for this diseased condition, and few have found permanent cure. My treatment is thorough and cures in 4 to 6 days, and there is no relapse of the old weakness that accompanied the disease. The treatment is direct and for the exact cause. It is a treatment not in common use, and is the most effective yet known.

Stricture

I cure in 10 to 15 days. I have devoted years of study to the formation and complete eradication of urethral obstruction. I restore health and tone to the membrane. My cure act cures "treatment" removes the necessity of any surgery. The right treatment, applied the right way, will always bring good results.

Contracted Diseases

I cure these ailments more quickly, with less pain and inconvenience than any one claiming to treat successfully these conditions. Has your case become chronic through improper treatment or by the use of caustic remedies? Has it caused deep-seated inflammation and irritation in the urinary tract, the result of which you now suffer from stricture? My treatment cures these conditions quickly, and the cure is permanent.

CHILD CHAUFFEUR.

YOUNGEST AUTOMOBILIST.

The youngest and smallest licensed operator of automobiles in the world is said to be Theron Curtis, a 10-year-old lad of North Attleboro, Mass. The small boy disdains toy machines and handles his father's 1000-pound touring car with the skill of a veteran.

Not only is he able to run the machine but he has an excellent working knowledge of the mechanical details of the vehicle, and is able to make such repairs as do not necessarily tax a youngster.

His first experience was with an electric carriage, and he then transferred his interest to the gasoline machine. Massachusetts, which prescribes no age limit for operators, has granted him a regular license, duly issued by the Board of Highway Commissioners. Of this he is proud, and since coming into possession of it he has run up a mileage record which exceeds many established by his seniors. Moreover, not a single accident has marred the accomplishment.

To prove the simplicity, ease, and perfect safety of automobile operation under reasonable conditions, no more cogent argument than the perfect assurance with which this child of 10 runs a heavy machine could well be conceived.

BOOTS'S CAREER.

A FEW ANECDOTES.

Turfmen tell some rather amusing anecdotes of Charles T. Boots of the firm of Boots & Hollenbeck, now racing at Ascot Park. Mr. Boots is probably the most scholarly man in the game as an owner, having been a Greek and Latin professor of marked ability in a Santa Clara county college before the racing fever struck into his bones.

He is a quiet, witty sort of a fellow, and has very original methods in conducting racing as a business. Not long since Boots bought a job lot of candy, and to encourage his stable boys in their workouts each morning he offered a box of candy to the winner of the morning's brush.

After several days had elapsed every one of the lads had won two or three boxes of goodies but one. He was disconsolate, and the others finally framed it up one morning to pull to him and shoo his mount in.

The boy won. He presented himself before Boots, who was sitting on the fence taking the proceedings all in, and demanded the candy. Boots, if quiet, is not a "mark," and his reply was characteristic:

"No, my son. That purse goes back to the association."

Whether this is the origin of the common expression that so and so is "the candy" in a race he is likely to win is not stated. The story is about as old as the expression, but has the merit of being an actual occurrence.

Boots has a big stock ranch near Milpitas, Santa Clara county, where his thoroughbreds are raised and trained. His career on the turf, both singly and in partnership has been a signal one, the Boots & Hollenbeck winnings up north being close behind those of W. B. Jennings & Co.

Great Deer Country Right at Angel City's Gates.

WHITE-TAIL DEER, MOST COMMON AND HARDEST TO FIND.

Southern California is not advertised extensively as a big-game country except in the matter of fishes, but within fifty miles of Los Angeles can be found deer in numbers as large as are found in one-half the much-talked-of big-game countries.

Furthermore, the Southern California deer furnishes the acme of sport in that it requires all that a hunter can summon of skill, carefulness and patience to get a shot at these white-rumped prizes.

Haunting the depths of the woodlands in the vicinity of the springs in the higher mountains, there are many of the famous family of Virginia deer, the white-tail—the most hunted, the most plentiful, and yet seldom brought into camp. Lucky the sportsman who has been able to bring down three of these fine deer in all his hunting experience.

Go into the near-by mountains, and in the cañon bottoms, you will see countless tracks of his majesty, the Virginia deer, the "white-tail" of Eastern States, and called just "deer" in Southern California. But to see these tracks does not by any means assure the hunter a shot at one of these magnificent animals; for not only is the white-tail the largest of the true deer of North America, but he also has a reputation as the best hider of all game animals. By nature fond of thick cover, he usually spends most of the time in the depths of some well-wooded cañon—a brushy river bottom full of briers and undergrowth is an ideal spot to look for him and an ideal spot to miss a running shot as well. And that is about all the chance you will get at a white-tail, too, unless you can stalk him, an almost impossible feat, by the way. One of these deer will lie securely hidden until the hunter, watching the middle distance instead of his feet, almost falls over him. Then he will get up with a "who-uf" and a tearing of underbrush, and by the time you get your gun to your face the deer will be somewhere over in the next county. They do not range high on the mountains, and most hunters will tell you that the best deer hunting is after the first heavy snow in the fall, when the deer come down into the higher foothills to get the new grasses brought out by the rains that usually accompany these early snows.

With the black-tail, the least common deer of this section, everything is different. Look for him in the open meadows of the mountains, where the pines wall in little valleys all clothed in tall grasses. There the smaller and darker deer moves on velvet hoofs noiselessly and seeing you, vanishes silently or with a low snort, seeking rather to escape by stealth than by speed. On the level and in the open the black-tail is a swift enough runner to try the aim of any rifleman, but in the piney woods he can be almost as silent as a mountain lion. The best way to hunt this deer is to take him at his own game and stalk him. Armed with a light rifle, for stalking a black-tail is an all-day job of hard walking, the hunter slips from tree to tree through the deer country, watching every clump of brush, seeing every leaf that moves, prepared at all times to swing the rifle on a shadowy, half-seen form slipping away through the dim recesses of the woods. Southern California is today better deer country than half the highly-advertised regions, but it is a country where every deer means hours of hard and unremitting work, and of all these the head of a black-tail is the most prized.

Few black-tails are killed by lions, but the Virginia deer suffer heavily, becoming entirely extinct in some localities through the depredations of the big cats. About the only way left to hunt the white rumped fellows with any hope of success is with hounds, and most of the county Boards of Supervisors have forbidden this, as they should have done long ago, so that, all in all, the deer of this section, in fact, of all the hills south of the Tehachepi seem in no danger of extinction.

Lion and Elk Fight Battle on Dangerous Ground.

VISTA OF THE OLYMPIC MOUNTAINS, FROM CLARKE'S POINT, PUGET SOUND.

Hunting, either four-footed or feathered game, is far different in our antipodal State to the northward than in this favored southern land of dry, open country and sunny skies, and hunting trips to the favorite big-game regions or duck-shooting grounds of Puget Sound mean a distinctly large and well-flavored taste of strenuous life.

Seattle nimrods return in triumph from a day's shooting on Swinamish Flats, with boatloads of geese and ducks, but they experience hard work, the buffetings of gales, and cold, drenching rains; muscle-straining pulls of miles in open skiffs against wind and tide, before the light of morning nad broken over the distant hills and mountains, the dark, ozonic forest and the troubled waters of the Sound.

This is the cream of the duck hunter's experience. The storms drive the birds from the more exposed places to the sheltered bays and marshes, and the wilder the day and the harsher the storm, the more eager for the fray is the thoroughbred nimrod, if he be of the proper experience and mettle, and the keener the scent of game in his nostrils.

Of the forest birds, grouse hunting takes the lead, quail and pigeon following in the order named. And scarcely less arduous and muscle-testing is this same grouse hunting, for the forests of western Washington are extremely difficult of threading, and the enthusiastic nimrod must force his way through tangled thickets of undergrowth and giant ferns, scramble over large fallen trees which everywhere block his pathway, climb steep hills and cross almost perpendicular - walled, gulches. But there is there, and the seasoned hunter allows not such trifles to swerve him from the pursuit. It may be seen that this is not a paradise for the tenderfoot sportsman.

For the chase are deer, elk, black and white-faced bear, mountain goats, mountain lions and wild cats.

Many exciting and thrilling adventures have woven themselves into the experiences of men who have entered the realm of the wild animals of this rugged country in the difficult retreats of the foothills of the Cascade and Olympic ranges, up on the mountain sides, in caverns or on the snow-covered peaks, where the hardy mountain goats find a precarious footing and look down upon their more lordly neighbor, the elk, as he gathers sustenance from the verdure just below the snow line. There, as here in the Southwest, the true sportsman is not of those who kill just for the sake of killing, nor yet of that other class which kills for a living.

The writer has witnessed remarkable struggles between the wild denizens of the Olympic mountains. Early one morning he came in sight of a deadly combat between a lion and a bull elk. The scene was a ledge far up the mountain side. Above stood a gnarled fir tree, whence had sprung the lion. Below, with only a margin of twelve or fifteen feet, the side of the mountain fell away almost precipitously for hundreds of feet. In the stillness of the dawn the sounds of the struggle came distinctly across the deep gorge, and in the clear, frosty air the spectacle was vivid.

The human intruder upon this lonely duel between the two monarchs of that savage realm stood spellbound during the short but terrible conflict.

The shock of the unexpected attack from an elevated ambush, the weight of the fierce cougar, and the sting of his mighty teeth and claws as they pierced the flesh of the elk gave him an advantage, but, with wonderful courage and strength, and made desperate by fear, the bull shook himself free and charged his foe with horns and hoofs in such a terrific onslaught that it seemed as if he would end the struggle.

The great agility of the lion stood him in good play, and again he sprang upon the elk, this time gaining a position upon the shoulders. Reaching down along the neck he buried his sharp teeth in an artery of his noble victim, and raked the flesh with his knife-like nails.

Then ensued a struggle entirely beyond description in its terrific intensity. Roar after roar of mingled rage, pain and fear came from the elk, while the lion's snarls added terror to the din of sounds. From side to side of the narrow ledge the combatants swayed until, with a mighty leap, as a deer with heart pierced by a rifle ball, the elk, bearing his foe upon his back with teeth still fastened in his throat, went over the precipice to be dashed to death upon the rocks.

With the idea of obtaining an elk steak, a pair of antlers and a lion skin at once, the writer climbed down the gorge. He found the cougar quietly taking his breakfast from the shoulder of his victim! The wily cat, as they fell, had leaped from the elk to the branches of a fir clinging to the mountain side, and from there descended at his leisure to the feast. He snarled and sprang lightly away, disappearing behind a rock before the hunter could get a shot. The elk's antlers had been broken by the fall.

PASADENA CLUB SHOOTS TODAY.

LOCAL EXPERTS GOING TO ALL-DAY TOURNAMENT.

Work Already Begun on Three Days' Contest Next May, and Promotion is Started—Shells Stolen from Clubhouse at Sherman.

The first all-day tournament of the recently-organized Pasadena shooting club will be held today at the grounds of the organization in that city. A number of local enthusiasts have engaged a special car to leave Second and Main streets at 8:30 o'clock this morning for the scene of the bluerock bombardment, and there promises to be four or five squads in line.

Among those going from here are Guy Lovelace, F. C. Stephens of Spokane, W. H. Seaver of San Francisco, J. E. Vaughan, J. W. Coxe, Fred M. Gibson, C. D. Hagerman, Charles Van Valkenburg, W. A. Wright, E. L. Blanchard, G. Grassby and Al L. Becker of Ogden. The last named is a crack of wide reputation in the West, having won several big tournaments.

The Pasadena Bluerock Club was organized last week. Sam F. Graham is the manager. An invitation was extended the Los Angeles trapshots to come over and help make the initial shoot a success. An informal practice shoot was held by the club last Sunday, at which about a dozen turned out.

H. Justina, a local ammunition man for the southwestern district, left Friday morning for a trip through the Territories which will take about ten days. He is promoting the three-day shoot that is to take place here in May, and is confident that D. D. McDonald, Burmeister, and possibly the entire Arizona champion five-man squad may be induced to attend.

The breaking open of the clubhouse of the Los Angeles Gun Club at the Sherman grounds last Sunday night, and the abstracting therefrom of three cases of shells, has caused members of the organization to entertain considerable doubts about the wisdom of leaving the trap now ordered there between shoots. They need have few fears on this score, however; the trap is too cumbersome a piece of machinery to be moved by a gang of boys. So exercised were Ed Vaughan and some of the others over the thieving of the shells that another proposition was sought from the Schuetzen Park association, whose grounds are on the other side of town, but it is hardly likely any change will be made, now that the Sherman grounds have been repaired. C. Sylvester, W. H. Seaver and others who owned the shells—about $50 worth—are convinced the boys employed about the place last Sunday stole the ammunition, as they knew it was there.

Work of promoting the big three-day May championship shoot is already under way, and advices have been sent as far north as Portland telling of it. The securing of added money will be started next week. The Tournament Committee has abundant time to arrange the details, and it is considered safe to assume that an attendance fully equal to the Ocean Park turnout of last year may be secured, and perhaps exceeded. That shoot was a local record-breaker.

Clarence Nauman, Otto Feudner, Clarence Haight, and other leading lights of the shotgun game around San Francisco have already signified their intention to come. Half a dozen may be expected from the Bay City. As usual the committee will have to figure on drawing as many outsiders as local shots.

Auto in the Klondike.

Although automobiles are very much of a novelty in the Klondike, they are not entirely unknown. An Oldsmobile has penetrated to that far corner of the globe, its owner, Fernand De Journel, a San Francisco attorney having taken it to Dawson City last spring. It is said to be the only motor vehicle ever taken there.

AUTO CLUB WILL GIVE REAL TEST.

COMMERCIAL MOTOR VEHICLES TO BE TRIED OUT.

Early in April Extensive Programme of Events Will be Put Through—Classification to be on Lines of Weight Carried.

For its service test of commercial motor vehicles the Automobile Club of America has selected a practical though novel method of determining the comparative values of different types of machines in New York. An arrangement has been made with two New York express companies whereby all vehicles entered for the competition will be placed under actual working conditions in the service of those companies for one week.

The dates named for the test are April 4 to 9, inclusive, and the concerns that will employ the contesting wagons will be the American and Westcott express companies. The vehicles will transfer and deliver merchandise, produce, baggage, etc., from the various depots of these companies during the entire week. An official observer, nominated by the club, will accompany each vehicle on each day of its employment to keep a record of its fuel consumption, load carried, mileage, and reliability.

The competition will be open to commercial motor vehicles of all types and power, whether manufactured in the United States or elsewhere. The classification will be on the basis of dead load carried by all wagons of like weight, whether of steam, gasoline or electric power, operating in the same class.

The following classes have been established:

First—To carry a dead load of 1000 pounds or under.

Second—To carry a dead load of 1000 to 2000 pounds.

Third—To carry a dead load of 2000 to 3000 pounds.

Fourth—To carry a dead load of 3000 to 4000 pounds.

Fifth—To carry a dead load of 4000 to 5000 pounds.

Sixth—To carry a dead load of 5000 to 6000 pounds.

Awards will be made in each class for the best performance, based on economy of operation, in time and fuel, ratio of paying load, ton mileage, and general reliability for service. It is believed that the test will be the most thorough and practical, as well as the most convincing to which motor vehicles ever have been put.

CHICAGO TEAM STARTING.

WILL BE HERE IN A WEEK.

President Hart's Chicago ball team will leave Chicago for Los Angeles on March 1. The National Leaguers will make practically the same sort of trip as last year, which broke all records. The mileage will run high up into the thousands, and the journeys alone show that the men at the head of the team are putting the club's condition above any monetary consideration. Of the Chicago Nationals Frank Chance, Jack McCarthy and Johnny Kling are already on the Coast. Johnny Evers, Joe Tinker, Jimmy Casey, Slagle, "Davy" Jones, Lundgren, Weimer and Wicker of last year's squad are all expected to be on hand, and they will be reenforced by Catcher John O'Neill and Pitcher Brown, the two players secured from St. Louis, in return for Jack Taylor; "Buttons" Briggs, the former orphan, who was a star pitcher for Toronto last season; "Dall" Howard, the new outfielder from Illinois, and Corridon, the pitcher and first baseman, who made the California trip with the team last season only to be taken ill with typhoid at St. Louis just at the opening of the league race.

With last year's club practically intact, this year will do much to develop team work, and with the additions to the ranks, Selee is confident of having a team that will bother the best in the National League.

MANY VETERANS ARE COMING.

PREPARING FOR ENCAMPMENT OF THE GRAND ARMY.

Department of California and Nevada Will Have Three-day Meeting in This City Commencing Wednesday, April 6—Kindred Bodies to Meet Here Also.

Fires of patriotism, fed by the veterans of the sixties, will burn with added brilliance at the coming assembly in Los Angeles. The Department Encampment of the G.A.R. will be held in this city on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, April 6, 7 and 8. It will be the annual gathering of representatives of the various posts of the order in California and Nevada. Not for eleven years has a department encampment of the G.A.R. been held in this city.

An attendance fully as large as that at any department encampment in several years is expected, according to reports received by the general Committee of Arrangements. The Division encampment of the Sons of Veterans, and the State departments of the Women's Relief Corps and of the Ladies of the G.A.R., respectively, will also have their annual meetings here within the three-day period.

A provisional programme has been arranged for the veterans' encampment. On Wednesday afternoon there will be a parade of the comrades through the principal streets under the direction of Assistant Adjt.-Gen. John H. Roberts, with William Young of this city as chief marshal. Perhaps the greatest demonstration will be that evening at Hazard's Pavilion, where will take place a public reception, with addresses by department officers and others.

Thursday and Thursday evening will be devoted to business sessions. Business will be concluded on Friday morning.

Friday afternoon will be occupied with an excursion to Long Beach, where there will be a "camp fire" in the pavilion. The camp fire and accompanying feast will be in charge of Commander W. S. Daubenspeck, chairman of the general Committee of Arrangements.

During the gathering the department headquarters will be at the Holbrook Hotel. The business sessions

MANY VETERANS ARE COMING.

PREPARING FOR ENCAMPMENT OF THE GRAND ARMY.

Department of California and Nevada Will Have Three-day Meeting in This City Commencing Wednesday, April 6—Kindred Bodies to Meet Here Also.

The spirit of patriotism, fed by the veterans of the sixties, will burn with added brilliance at the coming assemblage in Los Angeles. The Department Encampment of the G.A.R. will be held in this city on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, April 6, 7 and 8. It will be the annual gathering of representatives of the various posts of the States of California and Nevada. Not since these years has a department encampment been held in the city.

An attendance fully as large as that at the departmeht encampment in those years is expected, according to plans received by the general Committee on Arrangements. The Division Encampment of the Sons of Veterans, the State departments of the Women's Relief Corps and of the Ladies of the G.A.R., respectively, will also hold their annual meetings here during the three-day period.

An exceptional programme has been arranged for the veterans' encampment. On Wednesday afternoon there will be a parade of the comrades through the principal streets under the direction of Assistant Adjt.-Gen. Harry H. Roberts, with William Mead of this city as chief marshal. It is hoped that the greatest demonstration of the week will be that evening at Hazard's Pavilion, where will take place a public meeting, with addresses by department officers and others.

Thursday and Thursday evening will be devoted to business sessions. Business will be concluded on Friday morning.

Friday afternoon will be occupied with an excursion to Long Beach, where there will be a "camp fire" in the pavilion. The camp fire and accompanying feast will be in charge of Commander W. S. Daubenspeck, chairman of the general Committee of Arrangements.

During the gathering the department headquarters will be at the Holbrook Hotel. The business sessions will be held at Elks' Hall at No. 231 South Spring street.

The General Committee has issued a request, respectfully inviting citizens to display the Stars and Stripes and other appropriate decorations from their homes and places of business during the period of the gathering.

Representatives of Bartlett-Logan, Stanton and Kenesaw posts have selected a general Committee of Arrangements, with the following officers: Chairman, W. S. Daubenspeck; Secretary, S. O. Wood; Assistant Secretary, Henry Glaze; Treasurer, D. L. Durand. Following is a list of the auxiliary committees: Halls and Headquarters, E. W. Van Horn, W. S. Daubenspeck, J. M. Tibbets; Finance, Judge B. N. Smith, Capt. John Cross, C. C. Allen, E. W. Clark, D. L. Durand; Decorations and Badges, E. W. Van Horne, S. O. Wood, J. B. McCoy; Programme, Capt. J. M. Guinn, S. O. Wood, Henry Glaze, Sam Kutz, D. L. Durand.

WAX WARM ON WORLDLINESS.

Excitement Expected for the Methodist Conference.

Burning Questions About Several Amusements.

Present Discipline Seems Too Strict to Enforce.

There is excitement in store for the coming general conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in this city in May.

Leaders in the faith, deeply concerned over the popular drift toward liberality in amusement, are earnestly inquiring—

Shall a dead law be repealed or revived?

Shall dancing be permitted?

Shall theater-going be allowed?

Shall card-playing be tolerated?

Stirred to the core is the denomination. The situation is viewed by the heads of the church with thorough apprehension if not with alarm. The approach of the general copference has brought the question to an acute stage.

THE STORM CENTER.

In the discussion of "contraband" amusement, the storm center is the historic paragraph No. 248 in the Discipline, which was inserted in 1872, under the leadership of the church editor and parliamentarian, Dr. Daniel Curry.

The much-debated paragraph is not among the General Rules of the Church which Mr. Wesley himself established and enforced, but under the heading "Trial of Members," in a subdivision which refers to "imprudent and un-Christian conduct."

The General Rules, which belong to all Methodist churches the world over, simply forbid "the taking such diversions as cannot be used in the name of the Lord Jesus." This left the question of the number and the kind of diversions to the individual conscience, though most Methodists applied it as forbidding the theater, the dance, and cards.

A STINGING BLOW.

Mark Guy Pearse in his address a few days ago to the local Methodist Ministers' Union struck at this old rule of Mr. Wesley's and its old application a stinging blow. In discussing his son's work among the submerged classes of London slums he referred to the son's sacrifice in gathering a club of 300 young men whom he served day and night. The younger Mr. Pearse could not as a Methodist minister receive this club under the care of the Wesleyan Church and it passed over to the Established Church because "we Methodists have rules, you know."

Then with a shudder Mr. Pearse, in telling of his son's experience, added "Oh, horrors! Our General Rules forbid laying up treasure upon earth. Did you ever hear of a Methodist millionaire being dismissed from the church because of the money he had accumulated? Then why talk so much about the other rule and fly at a young man or woman who chances occasionally to dance or play cards? Let us be more consistent."

This hot shot struck a sensitive spot for the Southern California Conference has a large majority in its ministry and laity that favor strict enforcement of the discipline against "the world's amusements."

Mr. Pearse went still further by sanctioning his son's methods in holding together his boys' club by allowing smoking and adding a billiard-room. There was a slight murmur of protest on the part of some of the older brethren who resented Mr. Pearse's introduction into his address of these questions now under discussion in a sister Methodist church, whose guest he was. Many, however, felt that Mr. Pearse's frank and fearless treatment would tend to greater liberality in the church toward frisky young people, and greater charity toward other churches that differ in their standards from Methodists, or at least in interpretation and enforcement.

THAT PARAGRAPH.

And now the paragraph under discussion East and West in the daily and church press and in conventions and conferences is being more widely published than ever before. It reads thus:

"In cases of neglect of duties of any kind, imprudent conduct, indulging sinful tempers or words, the buying, selling, or using intoxicating liquors as a beverage, signing petitions in favor of granting license for the sale of intoxicating liquors, becoming bondsmen for persons engaged in such traffic, renting property as a place in or on which to manufacture or sell intoxicating liquors, dancing, playing at games of chance, attending theaters, horse-races, circuses, dancing parties, or patronizing dancing schools, or taking such other amusements as are obviously of a misleading or questionable moral tendency, or disobedience to the order and discipline of the church—first, let private reproof be given by a preacher or leader, and if there be an acknowledgment of the fault, and proper humiliation, the person may be borne with. On a second offense the preacher or leader may take one or two discreet members of the church. On a third offense let him be brought to trial, and if found guilty, and there be no sign of real humiliation, he shall be expelled."

DR. BUCKLEY'S OPPOSITION.

Dr. Buckley, the church leader, opposed in the general conference of 1872 the insertion of this paragraph and has repeatedly spoken and voted against it. In a recent editorial he reiterates his reasons:

"It is impossible to make a full list; there are some things in the list of less evil-producing influence than others, which do not command the consent of the ordinary conscience; because also the whole list would be forced upon the contemplation of persons attempting to join the church upon probation; and because we thought it contrary to St. Paul's method of dealing with such questions." Dr. Buckley has written a book against the theater. It is supposed therefore that he is stronger in his opposition to theater-going than to some other amusements mentioned in the article. He admits that the method is scarcely Scriptural, and that the grouping is defective.

He fought on Scriptural grounds the admission of women to the General Conference, and was defeated by Bishop Hamilton. Some new leader may appear in May to offset his interpretation and overcome his opposition to the paragraph. Methodism does not always regard even Dr. Buckley infallible or invincible.

BISHOP HALDEN'S PROPOSAL.

It is seldom that a Methodist bishop discusses the rules and polity of his church. A bishop has no voice nor vote in a general conference and usually from year to year he confines himself to the administering law rather than making law or altering it. The Methodists have therefore been astonished to find Bishop Walden, of Cincinnati, coming out in an article in one of the recent Advocates on Paragraph 248. The part that refers to "buying, selling or using intoxicating liquors as a beverage" should be transferred from this paragraph on "imprudent and un-Christian conduct" to an adjoining paragraph on "immoral conduct;" also signing petitions favoring license or renting property for the manufacture or sale of liquors. This plan of the bishop will probably be accomplished in May, but it does not dispose of the other part of the paragraph that refers directly to amusements.

WILLIS COOPER'S DEATH.

The Iroquois Theater tragedy in Chicago is largely responsible for the present acute discussion in Methodism on the amusement question. In that fearful fire two Methodist ministers and two prominent laymen lost their lives. The best known of the four was Willis W. Cooper, one of the most prominent Methodist laymen in the central west and a general official of the Epworth League. Indeed, he was the chief factor in organizing the league and was responsible for that part of the pledge which all active members are required to sign: "I will abstain from all those forms of worldly amusement prohibited by the Methodist Episcopal Church."

And, yet, from time to time he would attend at the theater a performance that was regarded first-class and that might relieve nervous tension produced by his multiplied activities. His death is generally regarded as a great loss to the church and he is widely and sincerely mourned.

That a Methodist leader, and especially a leader of young people, should die in a theater, was a great shock to Methodism. He had given the church much time, about one-fourth of his large income, and bequeathed her his entire estate. He loved his church and yet, according to the strict and common interpretation, broke her rules. At the time of his death, sorrow was so deep that few words were spoken or written in regard to his theater-going habit. But now it is interjected into the controversy by the New York Christian Advocate and the other Advocates, as well as the Epworth Herald.

EDITORS IN OPPOSITION.

Among the denomination's leaders in thought and action are Dr. Buckley and Dr. Berry, the editors. The latter is a strong candidate for the Episcopacy. Dr. Buckley wants the paragraph on amusements removed and Dr. Berry wants it retained. The latter was an intimate associate of Willis Cooper and a fellow official of the Epworth League. He had known for years Mr. Cooper's habit of going occasionally to the theater. He sought to persuade him privately; but never said a word or wrote a line against Mr. Cooper's holding office and being virtually the leader of young people's work, while writing in his paper and speaking at conventions again and again in the interest of keeping the young people in the zone of restrictions. In a recent editorial "The Great Thunderer" Dr. Buckley intimates that such a course by Dr. Berry and other league officials was reprehensible, and states that Mr. Cooper must have known that he was disobeying the rules of the church he loved and served, and that no good works can obscure this gross disobedience. Dr. Berry's confession of knowledge of the fact and his subsequent inactivity in righting his official family have greatly embarrassed the league.

CITY VS. COUNTRY.

Methodism has a large rural following, the largest of any church in our nation. She is increasing her strength in nearly every city, except New York, Boston, and San Francisco. The city pastors find this question much more embarrassing than their fellow-ministers on country circuits. Theaters and plays differ so widely and the temptations to dance, play cards, and attend the opera are so much more frequent and attractive that the city Methodist pastor finds it impossible to keep all members of his flock in line. He generally holds the standard high, but does not feel called upon to expel from membership, or refuse to admit into membership those who thus trangress. The administration of the discipline has become more and more lax. The real question as now discussed in the church press and conventions seems to be, "Shall a dead law be repealed or revived?"

THE SOLUTION.

The paragraph will probably be altered in May by the general conference, though not made less stringent. Its wording will doubtless be more accurate and less objectionable. In its present form a "judicial committee" of a previous general conference pronounced it unconstitutional. Most of the church leaders agree that a new statement will be better received and more widely respected. Then the whole paragraph may be taken out from its present heading, "Trial of Members," to remove the prevailing idea of a threat or penalty to another part of the discipline called "Advices and Helps." This action would have been taken four years ago had it not been for "fatal facility" in a speech of F. A. Arter of Cleveland, O. He desired the change, but so blundered in his speech that he antagonized a new element and the motion was lost. Under Dr. Buckley's leadership this solution of a very troublesome question, long pending, may be confidently expected.

CATARINA COPPER.

Representative of Evangelina Company Reports Finding Commercial Sulphides in Larger Quantities.

Dr. D. R. Wilder of the Evangelina Copper Company has just returned from Baja California and reports that the properties of the companies in the Santa Catarina district are making a good showing. He says the vein is a true fissure about six feet in width and that commercial sulphides are found in large quantities. The mother lode has not been opened, although six other veins have been exposed along a 4000-foot stretch on the surface. About ten thousand tons of carbonates have been exposed and about 1000 tons have been stacked for shipment.

H. V. Bard, who is conducting hydraulic mining operations in the Newhall district, was in the city yesterday. Mr. Bard says he is now mining on a large scale on his 120-acre tract a short distance from Saugus and that he is netting $100 per day. He began work in the district six years ago under the name of the Bard Gravel Mining Company, and has expended $10,000 in improvments and machinery. When he first went to Newhall his enterprise was laughed at by mining men, but now he is reaping a rich reward for his perseverance.

ONE EXPERT BARRED OUT.

Not Allowed to Testify at the Griffith Trial.

Sizzling End of Long Run of Testimony.

Jury Gets Pointed Warning from Judge Smith.

The testimony in the Griffith case ended yesterday in a little dismal sizzle just two weeks after it started.

Of course there are the arguments yet to follow. These will begin Monday morning. They will last three days.

The sizzle was occasioned by the insanity expert, Dr. P. C. Remondino, called by the defense to demolish at one bite the doctors who have testified against Griffith.

He was called to the witness stand yesterday afternoon, but was not allowed to testify.

After a long, fierce argument, Mr. Gage succeeded in convincing the court that it would be against the rules of the game to let him contradict the doctors who testified for the State on rebuttal.

Judge Smith held that the defense had called its experts on insanity to the witness stand, and should not be allowed to open up the case for another crack.

So the last witness testified in the case was one of the prosecution's chief experts, Dr. A. M. Gardner, for whom Dr. Remondino was to have been a sort of stand-off.

Griffith's lawyers were game losers, but Griffith sat crouched in a heap with signs of distress on his face when his star witness was silenced.

JURY WARNED.

When he excused the jury, Judge Smith insinuated broadly that attempts might be made to bribe.

He stopped short in the middle of his usual caution, and said earnestly, "Gentlemen of the jury, the law requires me to give this caution to you. It would be error if I failed to do so, but I want to say some things to you right straight out.

"I want to caution you to have nothing to do with any of the persons who are, in the parlance of the street, 'legging' for either side of this case.

"I take it that none of you jurors will visit a saloon or any other questionable resort until this case has been finally submitted to you.

"There's nothing in the world like fair play in the administration of justice, and I want this jury to be like Caesar's wife, above suspicion."

One of the last things in the case was a queer slap at Griffith about stage robberies.

It was one of the "supposing" questions.

Mr. Gage was asking Dr. Gardner to suppose the case of a man who was dodging around the street corners to avoid some unseen foe. The doctor said he would judge the man to be afflicted with a persecutory delusion.

"But," said Mr. Gage, "suppose that he had robbed a stage of $200, and suppose he had tried to rob another one containing $17,000, would you then say that he was afflicted with delusions because he dodged men who were not really there?"

Mr. Rogers immediately took an exception to the conduct of Mr. Gage in asking such a question. He denounced it as misconduct.

The next question was a bitter one, however, and made Griffith wince and scowl.

CASE OF "SUPPOSE."

"Suppose," said Mr. Gage, "that a man 35 years of age should, by fraudulent representations and pretending to love her, get the fortune of a young girl, marry her under the rites of the Catholic Church, and supposing after committing this great wrong, he should go around and tell people that she was trying to poison him, would you say he was suffering from persecutory delusions?"

When this was also objected to, Judge Smith raised his eyebrows and said, "Well, really, Mr. Gage, I don't remember the love-making part in this case."

Mr. Gage insisted it was there by inference, at least, but the question came to nothing at last.

This Dr. Gardner, who made a grandstand finish for the prosecution, is a portly, dignified man with an "imperial," well-dressed and well-groomed, and delivering his views with a Boston accent. He is said to be recognized as a leading authority on the subject of nervous diseases. He at present runs a private sanitarium at Belmont, but used to be the head of the asylum at Napa.

His testimony was rather a stately affair.

The gist of it was that Griffith did not have the right kind of symptoms for an alcoholic insane.

"Is it possible, doctor," asked Mr. Gage, "to have these delusions unless they be preceded by hallucinations?"

He said he believed not.

"If there are no hallucinations, is the patient suffering from alcoholic insanity?"

"I think not."

The prosecution has claimed all along that Griffith had no hallucinations; hence that his delusions must be fakes, or merely suspicions.

He stated that in chronic inebriety or alcoholic insanity, the patient becomes feeble, neglects his own interests, ceases to be able to initiate, and becomes inattentive to the interests of his own family.

"Are not suspicions of his wife found in the mind of the common drunkard?"

"Such a suspicion often exists," said the witness.

"Is not a chronic inebriate untruthful and always unreliable?" asked Mr. Gage.

"Generally found to be so."

The next was a strike at the doctors who examined Griffith personally and pronounced him insane, Drs. Brainerd, MacGowan and McBride.

One of the points the defense has shot at every doctor called for the prosecution was as to whether such an examination was not better than any answer to a hypothetical question could be. This was a slap back.

"State if a doctor can make a proper diagnosis merely by seeing the patient without seeing and consulting the relatives."

An objection was sustained to this on the ground that the question was leading and suggestive.

Mr. Gage tried it another way.

"State what is the usual mode of diagnosing such a case."

Witness hesitated. "Well, that is pretty broad," he said. But finally added that it was well to get all the information possible.

When Mr. Gage began to ask another question, the court stopped him in alarm. "Say, you're not going to take all day with these preliminary questions, are you?" he begged.

But the next one made Griffith sit up. Dr. Gardner answered that he had been watching Griffith attentively all during this trial, and that he has not in the least shown signs of being insane.

"We object to that," said Attorney McKinley, who wanted it stricken from the evidence.

He said that Griffith had been sitting there quietly at the table all the time and it was not a fair test.

Rogers was in the judge's chambers searching for a Supreme Court decision when the direct examination ended, and they sent for him to come to the bat.

LIKE BRISTLING CATS.

He came out and the witness and he looked each other over like cats bristling up on a back fence.

"Suppose, doctor," said Rogers sweetly, "Suppose that this patient had been examined by three competent physicians who have known him personally for many years, and then pronounced him insane, would that alter your opinion?"

Dr. Gardner replied with a quiet shot, saying that if any of the doctors had as much information in regard to the case as there was to be gained by consulting the relatives, he supposed their opinions would be of service.

He said that he knew Brainerd personally and MacGowarn, and knew of McBride.

"Are these gentlemen such skilled physicians as you have referred to?" asked Mr. Rogers.

"As far as Dr. Brainerd is concerned —he began.

"Wait, wait," shouted Mr. Gage, jumping up.

Judge Smith, on his objection, ruled that the question should not be answered.

"Is not the best way of ascertaining a patient's mental condition a personal examination?" asked Rogers.

"That is one way," said the witness coldly.

Rogers asked him to name the inducing causes of insanity.

"That," said the witness, "would take me four weeks."

Rogers asked him if it were not a fact a man might have delusions part of the time and not all the while.

The witness said yes; thought the delusions might be there just the same, but were often manifested only a part of the time.

Rogers: If you find a man who believes he is being poisoned and there is no ground for such belief, would you say that he had delusions?"

"I would."

"Would you call it an insane delusion?"

"Yes."

"If he had two such delusions would you call him insane?"

The witness thought a moment and then made this answer: "I should say that he was insane from a medical standpoint, but not from a legal standpoint, necessarily."

He said that the nature and quality of the delusions would determine the legal status (as to whether or not they would free him from responsibility.)

"That's all," said Rogers.

A DELAYED REST.

"The people rest," said Mr. Gage. "Er—wait."

He leaned and whispered to the District Attorney.

"Yes," he said. "The people rest."

It was dramatic when Rogers turned to the rail behind the table and called for Dr. Redmondino.

It was to be medical authority against medical authority—ironically enough, too, as it was evident one would contradict the other.

Dr. Redmondino is an expert on inebriety and an author on such subjects. He has a book in process of publication, a work on which he says he has spent years.

He is an interesting man, a stocky army-looking man with luminous eyes. He was a surgeon in the Civil War and a surgeon in the French army during the Franco-Prussian War. He said that most of his study has been of French authors, as he considers them the most learned in physicological medicine.

At the first question asked of him, Mr. Gage rose with a ponderous volumne and objected on the ground that it was not proper sur-rebuttal.

There and then occurred the hottest fight of the Griffith trial.

Supreme Court decisions were banged around at a fearful rate. Oratory ran in streams.

The prosecution took the ground that the defense had called its experts, and had asked them all about the symptoms of alcoholic insanity; now could not bring in any testimony unless on a new point not brought into the case until the prosecution's rebuttal.

The defense claimed that there were many such newspoints, such as the testimony of Dr. Kurtz that delusions as to the sexual organs must precede chronic alcoholic insanity, that physical degeneration must precede it; that Griffith's delusions could be merely suspicions; that the suspicions may be only those of a common drunk; that the shooting was not brutal enough for a crazy man.

Judge Smith held with Mr. Gage and ruled that the witness could not be questioned on these points.

After taking a bushel of exceptions, the defense announced that it rested.

So, except for the "shouting and the tumult," that is the end of one of the most sensational trials that ever took place in this county and which has attracted great crowds of people every day for two weeks.

UNIONS RUIN BOYS.

Judge Lindsey of Denver Says Apprenticeship Rule Has Caused Undoing of Many Lads.

Judge Ben Lindsey of the Denver Juvenile Court, who made such an interesting address to the club women Friday morning, is spending a few days in the city. Judge Lindsey is an authority on juvenile court methods and his investigations in this State convince him that California has made a good start toward the solution of this problem.

He says the principal feature in which he thinks the Colorado statute is superior to the California law is the section of the California code fixing responsibility on parents. Just before he left home, he says, two Denver men were sentenced to jail for neglecting their children and allowing them to roam the streets and fall into petty crime.

Judge Lindsey speaks very emphatically of the mischievous effects of the limitations placed upon apprenticeships by the labor unions. He states that there have come under his personal observation many instances in which boys have gone to ruin through being thrown onto the street by the refusal of labor unions to allow them to learn trades.

Judge Lindsey will speak again on the juvenile court theme at Unity Church this evening at 7:30 o'clock and will doubtless have a large audience.

BOOM COMING SAY BUILDERS

May Eclipse Any Activity of Previous Years.

Architects Crowded With Rush Orders.

Labor Market Overrun With Non-union Men.

With the opening of the spring season Los Angeles is to experience a building boom that may eclipse any of previous years—if the prophecy of the local Master Builders' Association is fulfilled.

This conclusion has been reached after a careful survey of the field by individual members of the association, and preparations are being made to meet every emergency of the situation.

That there is a sufficient warrant for the conclusion and evident cumulative conditions that can but result in tremendous activity is apparent to the experienced observer. For months homeseekers have been arriving daily, and the number deciding upon a permanent sojourn in Los Angeles is indicated by a canvass of the architects' offices of the city. In no previous year has there been such a rush of orders, not from speculators, but on the part of Eastern people who have purchased lots and propose building for themselves a habitation in this land of promise.

During the winter months greater building activity would have been experienced had it not been for the false impression given out that, owing to a contemplated traffic war there would be a material decrease in the price of lumber. With this thought in mind there has been a holding off on the part of prospective builders. With the realization that the hope for cheaper material, has no foundation in fact, there will be a stampede from architect to contractor.

Just why the impression should have been given out that a rate war was imminent is not clear to the master builders, who, from careful inquiry have ascertained that such a hope is entirely groundless. On the contrary, the fact is, the traffic managers, the jobbers and the mill owners, in a recent conference have fixed their lumber prices for the season and there can be no deviation, even should an independent buyer succeed in gobbling up large tracts of timber. The transportation companies have a cinch on such an emergency.

Another incentive to unusual building activity in the near future is found in the state of the labor market. Through the greed of the labor unions there are now in Los Angeles ten men for every present job. This condition has been brought about by threatened strikes and boycotts. Pinched by the union laborites, employers have for months been advertising throughout the East, and as a result there has been an unusual influx of men of all trades. Advantage will be taken of this fact—a fact that gives assurance of freedom from union interference—and every idle man will be able to find lucrative employment, providing he elects to operate upon independent lines.

LOCAL RAILROAD RECORD.

PLANNING BIG CAR SHOPS.

GREAT TROLLEY REPAIR PLANT FOR SOUTH PARK.

Will Have Capacity of Housing Thirty-two Coaches for Simultaneous Treatment of Damaged Parts—Artistic Depots for Various Junctions of Pacific Electric.

Plans have been completed for the big work shops at South Park, which it is expected will be finished in three months. Manager Howard E. Huntington stated yesterday afternoon that he was receiving bids for the excavation and foundation, and that the work would be vigorously prosecuted.

The shops are to be inclosed in one great brick building 94x260 feet. Twenty per cent. of the floor space will be devoted to a winding room and electrical repair shop, while the other 80 will be used for the care of the cars. There will be sixteen tracks in the structure, which will be capable of housing thirty-two cars for simultaneous repairs. All of the tracks will have continuous concrete pits underneath. The establishment will cost in the neighborhood of $25,000. It is expected that this will materially relieve the burden of work which has fallen on the repair plant at Seventh street and Central avenue.

TROLLEY DEPOTS.

The passenger depots which are to be built by the Pacific Electric Railway Company at all junctions of the system are designed along artistic lines. The one at Monrovia Junction on the Pasadena short line is nearly completed, and is said to be a fair sample of those to be located at all Southern California transfer points.

The structure is made of concrete, the only wood in its construction being the window frames and sash. The walls are six inches thick, and both the ceiling and the floor are concrete. The roof will be covered with metallic tiles painted red. The main part of the building is 20x40 feet, and there will be a porch ten feet wide extending entirely around the depot. The interior will be fitted up with a ticket office, waiting-room and lavatories.

The stations will be surrounded by grass plots, palms and shrubbery. The plan was designed by Engineer Cobb of the company.

The Ladies' Aid Society of the Third Presbyterian Church will give an excursion around the Kite-shaped track Tuesday. The train leaves Santa Fé station at 8:30 o'clock a.m.

Tom's Advantage.

Sharpe: I saw you in the burning stable. Don't you know you ran a risk of giving up your life for that cat?

Wheelton: Well, I guess Tom would give up his life for me.

Sharpe: Yes, but he can better afford it. He has nine lives.—Chicago News.

The Social World—Men and Women in Society—Personal Intelligence

EVENTS IN SOCIETY.

LILLIAN BLAUVELT, charming soprano, is also a very charming woman, as local society has discovered during the past week. She is not the isolated stage animal whose only appearances are at freak recreations, or the haughty prima donna living in guarded seclusion for fear of taking the fine edge off a few of her upper notes.

She is not afraid of a little after-the-theater supper with friends, and condescends to do a little smiling to these same from the stage—as witnesseth her pretty laughing interpolation of an air last Thursday night, as she recognized acquaintances in a box.

It has been the good fortune of the singer to have her lines cast in pleasant places during most of her life, and in this city and Pasadena she meets friends made on the continent, in the British Isles, and during her residence in the eastern part of the United States.

A supper was served at the Angelus grill in her honor Thursday night after her concert, the host being J. Ross Clark. Thirty guests were entertained. Friday she was the guest of Hon. J. P. Bass at Hotel Green, at luncheon, and at dinner was guest of honor at a large party at Hotel Maryland, arranged for her by L. S. Hoyt. An automobile ride through the San Gabriel Valley was programmed for yesterday morning, and lowering clouds and chilly air did not prevent the intrepid American woman from starting upon it.

Toasts were responded to as follows: "The Club," Colean Simpson; "The Suite of Three," J. W. McGhee; "Bill, Tell us a Story," C. W. Curtis; "The Great Chief," M. S. Greenleaf; "Across the Street," H. H. Wixon; "The Countersign," Ira A. Woy; "The Appelation," R. M. Pinkham.

Rev. E. P. Ryland of Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church, in his usual impressive manner, performed the ceremony.

The couple stood under a canopy of green and white, beneath which hung the wedding bell, and on the top two white doves were perched. The double parlors, in which the ceremony was performed, were decorated with smilax, ferns and carnations. In the doorways mistletoe warned the guests to beware of love's offering.

As the first notes of the wedding march were played, two little boys, Master Joseph Witney and Frank Eader, entered the rooms, carrying white ribbons, which formed an aisle, for the wedding party.

Miss Helen Tappe rendered music. The bride wore a traveling suit of blue, and carried white carnations and maidenhair ferns.

The marriage was solemnized in the presence of Miss Kate Hillerman, a young society girl of this city, and Mr. Bell of the Courthouse. The bride, a blushing, sweet-faced girl, comes from Denver, where she has many friends in the social world. Serious objections were raised to this wedding by the mother, who resides in Denver, as she was of the opinion that her daughter was too young to marry, but it seems the daughter thought otherwise, so the young couple took the lines in their own hands and were married in a most quiet manner. They only met last July, and since then decided they could not live without one another. They have gone honeymooning, and will make their future home in this city.

New Century Club.

The ballroom was heaped with a mass of hothouse plants and glowed with the lights of hundreds of Japanese lanterns. Then there was the little tea house, outside in the garden, lit with varicolored lights, where many a couple were seen exchanging love vows. What an ideal place for lovers?

There were many beautiful gowns seen through the evening, and the women were surely of the prettiest, and the music was of the best, Arend's Orchestra being in attendance.

After the reception hours, military whist was played in the front room. The tables were adorned with flags representing different forts and dainty score cards were used. THE ARMY MANEUVER CAMP.

The fight over the location of an army maneuver site on the Pacific Slope has become so involved that California is in danger of losing it. Friends of the Washington-Idaho site are taking advantage of what is said to be a political controversy in California, and are making a determined effort to secure the acceptance of that ground by the government.

The facts in the case appear to be that early in January Acting Adjt.-Gen. Hall, for the Chief of Staff of the Army, Lieut.-Gen. Young, ordered an investigation by a board of medical officers of the sanitary conditions of the Nacimiento rancho, the Santa Margarita rancho and the J. H. Henry rancho in Southern California, as sites for maneuver assemblage of troops. Examination was duly made and the board of medical officers reported that for sanitary and hygienic reasons Nacimiento and Santa Margarita ranchos were not available for camp sites—the former because it is hot and dry, without adequate water supply, such streams as flow through it being subject to contamination; and the latter because there is an inhabited town in the center of it over which sanitary control cannot be exercised. The report says that the J. H. Henry rancho fills all the requirements for the establishment of permanent camp grounds for the instruction of large bodies of troops, inasmuch as it has large area, with diversified surface, the soil draining quickly after rain, sufficient timber for fuel and shelter, appropriate climate, plentiful supply of pure water, with natural inclination lines for drainage and sewage.

Immediately following this report there sprang up a renewed and vigorous opposition to the purchase of the Henry rancho, situate in San Luis Obispo county, and the contention of Mr. Henry, set forth in a communication to The Times, is that this opposition is headed by ex-Congressman Loud because Henry is a Democrat and was Loud's political opponent three years ago. Mr. Henry contends that he is not receiving fair treatment, that his property is the only site in California which has been pronounced up to the requirements, and that the split among Californians in supporting the War Department in its choice of this site has brought the States of Washington and Idaho into the fight so prominently as to make them a serious menace to the establishment of the maneuver camp in this State, and therefore competitors whose strength cannot be lightly treated.

In fact, the opposition has been accorded no little consideration, as is evident from the fact that the House Committee on Military Affairs adjourned hearing in the matter for ten days in order to give the Washington and Idaho representatives opportunity to place before the committee a definite proposition. This they did, and Senator Weyborn of Idaho has offered an amendment to the Army Appropriation Bill, authorizing the Secretary of War to purchase a tract of land described in the report of Gen. George M. Randall on May 13, 1902, situate in Spokane county, Washington, and Kootenai county, Idaho, comprising 20,000 acres, and appropriating $50,000 for this purpose.

Without in any degree supporting the claims of any individual at interest in the matter, and without assuming to go behind the official reports made by the board of medical officers, it is obvious that if California is to secure the establishment within her borders of this very desirable maneuver camp, all political controversies which may exist must be harmonized at once, and Californians must stand as a unit in a strong effort to bring this camp to the State. In the face of actual developments of the past week, there can be no reasonable doubt of the strength of the opposition to California in this matter. Whatever forces, political or otherwise, may be at work to divert the establishment of the maneuver camp from this State, it is evident that prompt and vigorous measures must be taken if Southern California, which has numerous desirable sites, apart from the one favorably reported upon by the board of medical officers, is to secure the camp.

The Times believes Los Angeles county is able to offer the better site; but if geographical or other reasons are against our section, then let the camp go to the nearest available locality.

LINCOLN AND RUSSIA

In the dark days of our Civil War, when European monarchs and monarchists were laying the flattering unction to their souls that "the republican bubble had burst," the Czar of Russia stood alone as our friend. He sent a fleet of his war vessels to New York Harbor and another to the harbor of San Francisco, where they remained for nearly a year. With his ships the Czar sent a message, saying: "In any event, the American nation may count upon the sympathy of the Czar." Referring to these incidents, at a later period, William H. Seward, Secretary of State in the Cabinet of Abraham Lincoln, said: "It was our only consolation in those days. From that position Russia never receded. She sought the preservation of the Union."

Was the preservation of the American Union worth while? Does the blood of a million loyal men spilled in its defense count for anything in these days of forgetful greed and false teachings? If so, then how, in God's name, can any loyal American turn his back now, in her own day of trouble, on the one nation in all Christendom that stood by our side with drawn sword, our faithful friend and dauntless ally? If no other appeal will reach the ingratitude that would threaten us, listen, then, to the words of Abraham Lincoln himself, spoken in the hour of victory, to Seward and Sumner:

"Gentlemen," said Mr. Lincoln, "this is one of the happiest conferences we have had during these awful years. In the dark days of the past there has been one bright spot always shining out of the sky of our foreign relations. We three know, better than anybody else, the struggles we've made, the men we've sent, and the money we've spent to keep European nations from interfering in our contest. We've made these efforts in pretty much every important court of Europe, except one, and that is St. Petersburg. To that court we have never sent a man, and on Russia have never spent a dollar. She has been our steadfast friend from the beginning. Now, it has occurred to me that we three, knowing these things, ought to have a common understanding that whoever lives to see the whole country reunited, and again prosperous, ought to do what we can to have our government perform some great national act to show to Russia and the whole world that this government is not ungrateful."

There they are, the words of the great martyr, and although it has become, in these times, the fashion to forget old friends for new ones, to be ungrateful for good deeds done, and all that, there is yet scarcely one among us who would be daring enough to suppose that Abraham Lincoln, were he living today, would swallow his own words and turn his back on Russia. Just now, it might be a good thing for the average American to sit down and do a little hard thinking before going off half-cock on the Far Eastern question.

ARBOR DAY.

We have had much discussion of late in the papers in regard to the question of tree planting in Los Angeles. There will now be a chance for our citizens to show how much they are really interested in this subject, beyond the writing and talking point. The park and outdoor art section of the Civic Federation has arranged for an annual celebration, which will be known as the official Arbor Day. Several outside places, such as Long Beach and San Diego, have agreed to adopt the same day, so that the movement promises soon to become general throughout Southern California. The day selected is the 17th of March. That this is also the "17th of Ireland" is merely a coincidence. It is not, by the way, inappropriate that the day when the sons of Erin celebrated the "wearing of the green" should also be marked by an extensive planting of the green.

It is proposed to make this a triple event. The school children of the city will have a half-holiday that day. There will be some tree planting in the public school grounds, which in many cases is badly needed, as some of these places present a most bare and unsightly appearance. The Park Commission has allotted a hill in Elysian Park to the committee, and it will be planted to selected shade trees on that day. Then, it is further expected and hoped that citizens in general will get up a general planting of shade trees along the sidewalks on the same day. To do effectual work in this line there should be some sort of arrangement between those who live on certain blocks or streets, in order that a harmonious style of planting may be carried out. The various improvement associations might accomplish much good in this direction.

Other sections of the country, where trees are far less needed, have inaugurated a regular Arbor Day. It is somewhat strange that here, in Southern California, where one of our chief drawbacks, from a scenic standpoint, has been the bareness of the landscape, except in a few localities, there should hitherto have been no effort made to imitate the good example set by some sections east of the mountains. Now that the local movement has received the indorsement of a large number of our most progressive citizens, there should be no difficulty in making Arbor Day a prominent and popular feature of the year in Southern California.

The yellow journals are pro-Japanese to the last ditch. Of course; the "yaller" for the "yaller," every time.

ARIZONA'S PROSPECTS.

Arizona's prospects for Statehood have gone glimmering, for the time being. This is largely due to the actions of the Arizonans themselves, who have been split up into opposing cliques, each jealous and suspicious of the other. In declining to accept Statehood in the shape of an unwieldy combination with New Mexico, the Arizonans were right, as The Times has said. Apart from this, however, there has been and still is quite a considerable element in the Territory, representing some of the largest tax payers, who are privately opposed to Statehood just now in any shape, although, for good and sufficient reasons, they do not care to come out publicly and announce their views, because all those people who have everything to gain and nothing to lose by a change of any kind—and such people always constitute a majority in every section—are loudly and enthusiastically, if unthinkingly, in favor of immediate entry into the sisterhood of States, and their opinions are voiced by newspapers, some of which are always ready to jump on and denounce as a horse thief, a traitor and a public enemy, anyone who has the audacity to entertain a different opinion as to the advisability of immediate Statehood for the Territory. These men who oppose the present admission of the Territory have a vivid recollection of the doings of recent Arizona legislatures, and they fear that Statehood would be a case of "out of the frying-pan into the fire."

However, as The Times has said, when the time arrives that Arizona has sufficient population it will be entitled to Statehood, not as a favor, but as a right, and its people will then have a chance to see whether their condition under a State form of government is better or worse. They will have then to work out their own salvation, with no protecting hand at Washington to see that their chief executive and their judges are at least men of average honesty and decency. That they will have long to wait is not likely, for Arizona has been making rapid growth since the last census was taken, and promises to grow still more rapidly in the near future. While silver is no longer a very important item of production, owing to the depressed valuation of that metal, on the other hand, Arizona has jumped to the front as one of the world's leading producers of copper. In addition to the great output of the mines at Jerome, and Globe, and Bisbee, and Douglas, new veins are being constantly discovered and opened up, so that it will not be surprising to see the copper output of the Territory doubled within a few years, as this metal is becoming more and more indispensable. Owing to the development of electric power there is no fear that copper might follow the example of silver and take a slump, even under the influence of a rapid and extensive increase of output.

Another great thing for Arizona is the construction, by the United States government, of the Tonto Basin reservoir, the largest in the world, which will provide water for several hundred thousand acres of land that only awaits irrigation to produce large crops of valuable products. This will doubtless be followed by other similar enterprises on a smaller scale, either undertaken by the government or, by private capital, and before long Arizona will pass through the experience of California, emerging from the mining era to one of horticulture, although, as in California, her mines will continue to yield handsome revenues "on the side."

Under such circumstances the people of Arizona may well cease to worry about the will o' the wisp of Statehood, which is really of far more importance to a few chronic office seekers than to the great mass of the people. They may patiently await the time when they will be in a position to demand Statehood as their right, under the Constitution, and then, as The Times has previously observed, a good many of them may be wishing that they had decided to wait a little longer.

Now will those fire-eating "gernalists" of the Sun-Kissed Territory kindly put that in their pipes and smoke it?

GENIUS AND GENEROSITY.

It has been said that genius and insanity are closely allied, and there is probably more than a little truth in the assertion. It certainly cannot be said that there is any close alliance between genius and the art of money making. It is rare, indeed, to find an artist, a scientist, or a writer of great ability, who also possesses the faculty of money making. This is not surprising, for the instincts and ideas of the scientific, artistic or literary man run in quite a different groove from those of the man of money—the banker, or stock broker, the merchant or the manufacturer. To be a successful money maker, nowadays, one must not only be born with talent for business affairs, but must undergo a serious training.

Consequently, we very seldom find that men of great achievement in the fields of art, or literature, or science, acquire great wealth, while more often they are frequently hard pushed for the actual necessaries of life. This leads to the thought as to whether it would not be appropriate and proper if men of means, who are able and willing to do something to help the world along, should occasionally seek, in some graceful and inoffensive way, to encourage and aid those who are making the world brighter and better—who are furnishing instruction and entertainment to those who are engaged in the material development of the world.

In Europe, where they are accustomed to lean more upon the government for things that we consider as entirely in the province of private endeavor, the governments go to the extent of subsidizing operahouses and theaters, and in many other ways assisting in the progress of art and science. This is something that is not likely to be approved in this country, but why should not some of our multimillionaires, who are constantly giving vast sums of money to colleges and libraries—of which some people think we, perhaps, have almost a sufficiency just now—devote a portion of their surplus to seeking out and encouraging artistic and professional workers, who are doing really good service to their generation, while not enriching themselves? It looks as if there is here a promising field for investigation on part of our Rockefellers, and Morgans and Carnegies, and others who have more money than they know what to do with.

HIS TIME WILL COME.

The Russian Bear to the Powers: Keep your shirts on, boys, and don't get excited. I'll get a good swipe at him yet, and then—

A curious thing to many people is the manner in which European rulers are in the habit of invoking the name of the Deity, when they go to war, each apparently taking it for granted that God is on his side. To an unprejudiced outsider, it appears as if this is certainly a case of breaking that commandment which forbids the taking of the name of the Lord thy God in vain. A striking example of this was furnished in the messages sent by old Emperor William to his consort, during the Franco-Prussian War. One irreverent English paper paraphrased one of these dispatches to "dear Augusta" as follows:

"Praise God from whom all blessings flow,
Ten thousand Frenchmen sent below."

There's at least one commendable thing about Lillian Russell, who, with her graceful presence, was lately in our midst. Although old enough to be a grandmother, and probably being entitled to the name of the same with all the appurtenances thereunto belonging, she still preserves her youthful good looks and steadfastly refrains from becoming a "has been." Go it, Lillian; long life to you.

That the great American public ultimately foots the bill for strikes is clearly shown by the statement that since the settlement of the big coal strike the companies have produced more than 70,000,000 tons of coal, which has been distributed to the market for something in excess of $75,000,000 more than would have been received by the operators at the prices prevailing before the strike.

Edward Bok has an article in the World's Work for March under the heading "Why People Disbelieve the Newspapers." Brother Bok is getting to be quite a preacher of late, not to say a prophet. Is it possible that he would have us neither read nor believe anything but the Bible and the Ladies' Home Journal—or, as we should perhaps put it, the Ladies' Home Journal and the Bible?

The sentence given to Machen, Groff and Lorenz for their part in the postal frauds is too light rather than too severe. No leniency should be shown toward such deliberate conspiracy in high places. The punishment should be such as will make other men in similar positions think several times before they betray their trust.

The loss on the Wisconsin Capitol is estimated at well toward a million dollars, while the insurance amounts to only $6000. It will be interesting to learn what the people of that State think now of the plan of having the State take the risk on its own buildings.

Of course President Roosevelt was indorsed for nomination by the Republican State Committee of New York. Anyone who thought he would not be had a wish that was father to the thought.

That America is directly interested in the fate of Korea is shown by the statement that there are about 130 American missionaries in that country, with 30,000 adherents.

Many thousands of dollars have been added to the wealth of Southern California since yesterday morning, and all we've had to do has been to wait and enjoy seeing it rain.

The possibilities of flower culture in California may be seen from the fact that there are now annually sold in this country cut roses to the value of over $6,000,000.

Central Park would make a beautiful site for a public library, but a library located there would spoil a beautiful park.

TO HIGH LEVEL GOES WATER.

BUILDING RESERVOIR ON THE CAMPBELL-JOHNSTON HILL.

Elevated Service Will Supply Residences on Grounds at Altitudes Not Hitherto Practicable—Martial Appearance of Work Suggests Fortresses—Ready in Two Months.

The highest reservoir in the city is being constructed at Garvanza by the city water department. It will supply the elevated territory of the Garvanza and Highland Park districts and other parts of the First Ward.

Passengers on the trolley line to Pasadena marvel at the view presented by the new work on the Campbell-Johnston Hill. Surrounded by slopes, just now taking on their delicate robing of verdure, the great banks of yellow earth stand forth with striking vividness. In these stirring days of war and rumors of war these banks, martial in appearance, call to mind the rearing of earth fortresses.

But this is simply the war of the ever-progressive human animal, striving to overcome difficulties interposed by nature. It is in pursuance of a plan to make practicable for residences the higher levels and to supply with better service the people who already occupy some of the altitudinous sites.

The completion of this reservoir will make available as home locations some of the most picturesque hills in Southern California, and with the present growth of the city it will doubtless be but a short time until the First Ward hills shall be one of the attractions of Los Angeles.

The new site is at the crown of the first hill in the Parkdale tract, at the northern terminus of Avenue 66. Recently the city secured from the Campbell-Johnston brothers a deed for two acres on the very top of this hill, and in the center of this the reservoir work is in progress.

The reservoir itself is to be 90x90 feet, and fifteen feet in depth. Its capacity will be 750,000 gallons, and it will supply all the residences in the Garvanza and Highland Park district above the 550-foot level. It has an elevation of 730 feet, while the old reservoir on which the northern end of the city has had to rely, had an elevation of only 610 feet.

Among the districts to be supplied by the new reservoir are the New York tract, and the Garvanza addition, both of which are well settled with homes. This service will reach numerous points where private water connections have been in use heretofore.

Superintendent Mulholland expects to have the new water basin in readiness for use within two months. It will be supplied with water pumped from the old Garvanza reservoir. The present gasoline plant will be replaced by a much larger one, so that the new reservoir may be kept filled within a foot of the top of the walls.

There are yet about 1300 yards of earth to be excavated. The concrete workers will begin their labors the latter part of this week. The great hole is to be lined with concrete, which will also run up six feet above the earth level.

Ever since the city acquired the water system, both the Garvanza and Highland Park people have been making moves to secure this high-service system and now that it is assured they are gratified.

With this improvement the northern part of the city is to be well supplied and the territory which lies just outside the limits, but which is as thickly settled as that within the city's lines, is being served by a new system recently installed by the Campbell-Johnstons.

IN SILENCE.

Those who nearest to us are—those who love us well—
E'en though we tread the way side by side, ne'er can tell What thoughts—what hopes—what fears—deep in our souls may dwell—
Nor tempests of the heart that only
God can quell.

And thus—upon the field of life, with eyes grown dim,
We meet the daily round of cares, with courage grim,
As if no heartaches filled life's measure to the brim—
While each and every soul, in silence, walks with Him.

—ALICE J. STEVENS.

AN ANCIENT CITY.

Seoul, Walled Fortress, Where Japan and Russia Seek Supremacy. Smells Strong.

[Outing:] Seoul, the capital of Chosen, is built amid a network of hills eighteen miles from the sea. It is an ancient walled city, fortified in the strongest way by smells that would drive any but an Asiatic army forthwith into the ocean. It is poor in appearance, but rich in fleas. On autumn nights tigers frequently contest the right of way with belated pedestrians, and this is the chief reason why one has the entire street to oneself in a moonlight stroll after 8 o'clock. Metaphorically, one can scarcely see the town for the bald, bulbous and bullet-headed Buddhist priests who fatten on the superstition of the populace and lead licentious lives in the adjacent monasteries.

Barring an occasional court function, marked by street processions, Seoul is triumphantly devoid of sights interesting to a traveler. The streets lack entirely those picturesque characteristics of a Chinese or Japanese thoroughfare, and a vista across the Korean house tops is one of appalling monotony. One seeks in vain for attractive souvenirs. In the small shops of Seoul Japanese beer, matches, cigarettes and cheap crockery form the chief stock in trade, while long-stemmed Korean pipes and metal-banded Korean knives are offered in the most pretentious shops. Here, likewise, can be had the really unique Korean fans, made of silk or paper, finished in oil and covered with curious native designs. These fans are dipped in water before they are used, and the little breeze produced by them is astonishingly cool.

The wall surrounding Seoul, from which kites are ever flying, is but a poor edition of the great Chinese wall that leads down to the sea at Shanaikwan. Piercing this Korean copy are the city gates—picturesque passakeways—which are promptly and irrevocably closed with the setting of the sun. The west gate will be entered by the tourist on reaching the capital from Chemulpo, and should he come to the outside of this but a minute after the sun has disappeared behind the horizon, and the "big bell" has boomed its mournful warning note, he is elected to camp in the open until Phoebus has cycled round the world on the equatorial path. If he reaches the gate five minutes before it closes on its groaning hinges he will witness a sight that will almost repay him for the toilsome trip up from the coast.

HOME.

Precious the home, though but a rifted rock
Where way-worn shepherd tarries with his flock;
Precious the friendly covert, though it be
Only the shelter of a lonely tree.
Dear is that world-old, warm, heart-pulling thing,
To man and beast and bird one gladdening;
Dear is the roof, the hole, the lair, the nest—
Hid places where the heart can be at rest.

But home will greaten as the years go by,
Probing the soul and lifting the low sky;
When Beauty shall step downward from her star
To smile away the blemish and the scar;
When Science shall draw down Orion's band
To ease the burden of the Woman's hand.
And all the Powers of Hearth and Air and Fire
Shall be the lackeys of the heart's desire.

And home will sweeten in the coming days,
When widening love shall warm these human ways;
When every mother pressing to her face
Her child, shall clasp all children of the race.
Then will the rafter and the oaken beam
Be laid in music and the poet's dream—
Then Earth, as far as flies the feathered foam, Shall have in it the friendly feel of Home.
—(Edwin Markham, in Twentieth Century Home.

Value of the Hearty Laugh.

What is there in a hearty laugh that clears the moral and mental atmosphere and gives a man or a woman an new physical vigor? There is nothing like it for banishing miasmas and doubts. There is something infectious in its merriment, too. If we only had more time for spontaneous gayety and joy we would be better physically, mentally and morally. The man who laughs seldom is a dangerous one. Caesar recognized that centuries ago. Even if one thinks the man who does not laugh has no one but himself, he is, nevertheless injuring society at large by reducing the sum total of mirth and jollity. Besides he is sure to hurt himself, because he denies himself the simple, innocent joys which make men one with mankind. There is something tonic in a good laugh. It frees the spirit and quickens the blood.—[Omaha World-Herald.

The Board of Control of the United States Naval Institute on February 16 awarded the annual prize for the best essay to Lieut. S. P. Fullinwinder. The subject was "The Fleet and Its Personnel." The motto of the author was "commune bonum." The prize was $200 and life membership in the Institute.

It is denied that there is any truth in the stories that have lately appeared in the daily press to the effect that there was some unpleasantness between Maj.-Gen. Corbin, because of his having countermanded the order to send United States troops to Baltimore, but this is now denied, and it appears that in so doing, he was well within the constitutional provisions regulating the use of Federal troops on occasions of this kind.

"Every age has its pleasures, its style of wit, and its own way."—from an old print.

George IV. introduced the fashion of wearing trousers, in place of tight pantaloons, about 1776.

PUBLIC SERVICE—OFFICIAL DOINGS.

SUMMARY OF THE DAY.

The Councilmen had an informal conference yesterday over the petition of the Los Angeles Independent Gas Company for a change in the license ordinance and decided to deny the request.

Some changes in the liquor laws are under consideration by the Council.

The Park Commission yesterday decided on some of the features for the celebration of Arbor Day in Elysian Park.

A laboring man named Hess at San Pedro has just succeeded in getting a judgment against Justice Downing after a very strenuous contest.

The street railway transfer suit was argued on demurrer yesterday before Judge Oster of San Bernardino, and the matter was then taken under advisement.

A. J. Moore, who kidnapped his baby two night ago at Pasadena, was before Judge York yesterday and after a full chance to explain, was adjudged guilty of contempt and fined.

AT THE CITY HALL.

GAS LICENSE CAUSES WAR.

INDEPENDENT COMPANY TO MAKE A STRONG FIGHT.

Petition to the Council Asking That the License be Proportioned to the Gross Revenue of Gas Companies Will be Denied by Council Tomorrow.

A battle royal is impending between the city and the Los Angeles Independent (Lowe) Gas Company. The payment of the monthly license is in dispute. Back of this pretext for a legal argument lies a long series of attempts on the part of the company to get the best of the city.

The company asserts that the license tax of $100 a month on all gas companies doing business in the city is exorbitant and inequitable. Last week a petition was filed with the Council asking that the license be made proportionate to the gross revenue of the plants, and suggesting the following scale: Companies having a gross revenue of over $50,000 a month, $100 a month license; gross revenue between $25,000 and $50,000, $50 a month; gross revenue between $12,500 and $25,000, $25 a month; gross revenue less than $12,500, license $10 a month.

There was a brief conference over this petition between members of the Council yesterday, and it was the prevailing sentiment that it should be denied. The City Fathers believe that no concessions should be granted a company that persistently assumes the attitude of fighting the city.

When the Independent Gas Company began to lay its pipes about two years ago the Council took the stand that the company should purchase a franchise before tearing up the streets and entering the gas field against a company that had been forced to secure such a concession. Under the direction of T. S. C. Lowe the company refused to accede to any of the demands of the Council and assumed a pugnacious attitude which has been maintained ever since.

Last week the little formality of arresting officials of the company for refusing to pay the gas license was enacted, and another case was added to the overcrowded Police Court calendar. For one reason and another the legal test of the license ordinance has been postponed from time to time, but unless the Council takes some action favoring the Independent company tomorrow—and this is not at all likely—the cases will be pressed by the city prosecutor. A long legal fight is looked for, as the case will doubtless be appealed to a higher court.

MAY CHANGE LAW.

NEW ORDINANCE DISCUSSED.

Changes in the liquor laws are considered by the Council, which will compel the Police Commission to more severely punish infractions of the ordinance.

It has frequently happened in the past that when a saloon keeper was convicted in the Police Court of violating the city ordinances and his license was revoked, the Police Commission at a later meeting would give back the license either directly or in the name of some dummy. For this reason saloon keepers have lost most of their fear of the Police Commission as they are convinced that punishment for a violation of the ordinance is only temporary.

Several eastern cities have provisions that members of the Council think might to advantage be incorporated in our liquor laws. The least technical of the provisions are those declaring that no license can ever be granted to a man who has had his license revoked, and that no saloon keeper can have in his employ any man who has ever been convicted of violating the city ordinances.

ARBOR DAY.

PRELIMINARY ARRANGEMENTS.

The Park Commission met yesterday morning with Abbot Kinney to arrange some of the practical features of the celebration of Arbor Day which has been set for March 17.

It was decided to prepare about five acres of land near the reservoir in Elysian Park, about one-half mile back from Fremont Gate, for the trees. The ground will be made ready and all arrangements completed by the park force before the appointed day. Perenial trees such as pines, cedars, palms and live oaks will be planted.

There will be exercises suitable to the occasion but whether they will be held in Central Park or at Fremont Gate was not finally determined yesterday. Col. J. B. Lankershim was chosen as grand marshal of the day.

Case of Leprosy.

A case of mixed tubercular leprosy was found yesterday at No. 615 Buena Vista street by Frank Sabichi of the Medical College, and sent to the County Hospital. The victim is Luciana Pres, a Mexican woman who came here three months ago from Guaymas. She is about 50 years old and the symptoms of the disease are fully developed. Health Officer Powers saw the woman yesterday at the County Hospital and unhesitatingly pronounced the case one of leprosy. Dr. Powers says that what is puzzling the medical fraternity about the disease is the period of incubation of the bacillus which experts are inclined to believe covers a period of from three to five years.

Will be Fast Race.

Next Saturday the employés of the City Hall will visit Agricultural Park to see a test of speed between those marvelous equines, Laura G. and Magnolia. Laura G. is owned by George L. Pierce, Milk Inspector, and in the patois of the track, "she can go some." Laura G. also has a pedigree which begins with sired by Electioneer, and runs back into the dark ages. Street Superintendent Werdin is the proud possessor of Magnolia, sired by Conifer, etc., etc., and believes that she can cut streaks in the atmosphere and tie bowknots around Laura G. In fact, Werdin believes that when Magnolia begin to come down the fence Laura G. will look as if she had been tied to a post with an anchor chain. There is that difference of opinion between the owners regarding the speed of their respective steeds that makes for fine sport on the race track, and there will be plenty of enthusiasm and excitement even if no world's records are broken. The great equine speed contest is scheduled for 2 o'clock p.m.

Will Sell Engine House.

It may be cheaper to move than to pay rent, but the City Council has discovered that in some cases it is cheaper to build a new house than to move an old one. An engine-house of mission style is to be built at the corner of Jefferson and McClintock streets, and the Council planned to move the old house to Seventh street and Santa Fé avenue, and install a hose company. But the lowest bid the Council could get for moving the structure was $1800. This staggered the City Fathers, and they decided instead to sell the old house for what it would bring as old lumber. This plan is favored by the Fire Commission, which yesterday adopted a recommendation of similar import. The old house will bring about $700, it is said.

Compiled Ordinances.

Deputy City Clerk Wilde has just finished a valuable compilation of the penal ordinances passed since the Camp & Lissner compilation of October, 1900. Seventy-nine penal ordinances have been passed since then, and the task of indexing them and indicating the many amendments made was difficult and tedious. The compilation will be of great benefit to lawyers and city officials.

Treasurer's Balance.

There is more money in the City Treasury now than at any time since the transfer of the $2,000,000 water bonds for the domestic system was consummated. Yesterday the City Treasurer's balance was $2,161,474.40.

AT THE COURTHOUSE.

WON HIS CASE AND LOST IT.

JUSTICE DOWNING MULCTED IN DAMAGES.

While Wife-beater Hess Secures a Judgment He Will be Compelled to Dig into His Jeans in Order to Pay Expenses.

The curtain fell on a comedy of errors yesterday when Judge Allen handed down an opinion in the damage suit instituted by a man named Hess, against Justice Downing of San Pedro. False imprisonment was alleged and technically, Hess won out. He asked for $3000 as damages and was awarded $26. But there were some odd features to the story.

Hess was arrested at San Pedro for wife-beating, was tried and convicted, and was sentenced by Justice Downing to pay a heavy fine and serve a term in the County Jail. Constable Carlson had been the arresting officer and acted at the direction of the court throughout these proceedings as well as those that followed.

When Hess was brought to the jail he got an attorney to take hold of his case, and he was brought before Judge Smith on habeas corpus proceedings. The contention was that the sentence was excessive and not legal under the statute, and Judge Smith took this view of the matter and ordered the defendant discharged.

But a part, at least, of the sentence was valid, for Hess had been convicted of a crime, and the dividing line where the legal sentence ended and the illegal began was the time that habeas corpus would have the most potent effect. Anyway, Justice Downing took the view that as the matter stood it was as if Hess had never been sentenced, and the Constable tracked on Hess's trail and brought him before the justice for sentence again. Once again the man found himself in the County Jail and once again habeas corpus was invoked, and again he was released. Then Hess vowed vengeance and began the damage suit.

Judge Allen holds that he has only one ground for complaint, and that the other issues raised have no merit. But on the one ground he holds that the discharge by the Superior Court in the first instance was complete, and Justice Downing was without authority to cause the man to be again arrested.

"While it may be true," says Judge Allen, "that the plaintiff should not have been discharged until he had completed a portion of the sentence legally imposed, yet jurisdiction is not given to a Justice of the Peace to correct errors of a higher court."

Under these circumstances the court holds that Hess is entitled to a judgment, but says that there are peculiar circumstances in connection with the case. The fact that Hess is in court with a record against him of having beaten his wife in the opinion of the court precludes any supposition that damages are due him for disgrace or injury to his feelings.

"A man who will beat his wife," says the court, "is not of the temperament that could possibly be effected in his feelings or standing in the community by a mere arrest and incarceration in jail."

It is the man's loss by being deprived of his earning powers that alone is considered by the court. Judge Allen sized him up as a laborer and said that he ought to be able to earn $2 a day. As he was in jail eight days that meant $16. But as every injury of the kind presupposes a damage resulting he holds that Hess is technically entitled to something. He thinks $10 a reasonable amount. Judgment is therefore ordered in favor of Hess for $26.

But this judgment is given without costs, and so after all the defendant, while able to dodge the penalty of his wife-beating in jail, will be out of pocket after all, for the costs will amount to a good deal more than his judgment.

LEGENDS OF IRELAND.

LAW LIBRARY ENRICHED.

When Justice Horace Gray of the Supreme Court of the United States died last year his select and valuable library was sold, and the full set of the Irish reports were purchased for the Law Library in the Courthouse.

This set of books has now been complemented and completed with the "Statutes passed in Parliaments held in Ireland," from the time of Edward II in 1310 to the time of George III in 1761. These books have a valuable as well as a curious interest. On the back of each of the twenty-two large volumes is emblazoned the coat of arms of Great Britain in gold, and the old-fashioned style of writing as well as the strangeness of the text make these Irish Parliamentary reports of great interest to the student of history as well as the student of law.

The very first statute in the time of Edward II has a smack of modernism about it. It is to restrain great lords from taking prizes, lodging or sojourning against the will of the owner, and it is set out "that if great lords take from people without ready payment and agreement, or harbor at their houses against their will, it shall be deemed robbery."

TRANSFER CASES.

HAYDEN MATTER ARGUED.

The Hayden suit against the street railway companies to recover damages for being refused transfers to and from the Ninth-street road, and for being ejected from the cars, was before Judge Oster yesterday. The case was up on demurrer. The case was set in Judge Allen's department but as he lives in the neighborhood where the transfer question was first mooted he felt a delicacy about trying the cause. This despite the fact that counsel on both sides were perfectly willing to have him do so. While appreciating the compliment Judge Allen preferred to have the case tried by some other judge and as Judge Oster of San Bernardino was agreeable to both parties, and he happened to be sitting for Judge Trask, he was invited to hear arguments on demurrer. No one of the judges of the Superior Court were spoken to about the case, and consequently no one of them refused to try it either on the ground of being disqualified or on any other.

Attorney Crutcher yesterday rested his argument in behalf of the railroad companies upon two grounds: First, that the statute providing a penalty for charging a distinct fare over connecting lines has been repealed by implication, and furthermore is in conflict with section 501 of the Civil Code. Secondly, that the statute is unconstitutional inasmuch as it is not general in its terms, and its provisions do not apply to all cities alike.

The opposite stand was taken by Attorney Edgerton for the plaintiff, and then the court took the matter under advisement.

KNOCKED ORDINANCE.

LODGING-HOUSE KEEPERS WIN.

The case of O. E. Grubb, charged with violating the lodging-house ordinance, was before Judge Oster yesterday on habeas-corpus proceedings. It was a test case to have the court pass upon the lodging-house features of the ordinance licensing various businesses in the city.

The State permits licenses for revenue based upon the amount of the business done, but the court held that the city ordinance in so far as it affects keepers of lodging-houses is in conflict with the charter of the city. The tax is based by the ordinance upon the number of rooms in a house rather than upon the amount of business done and the income from the occupancy of such rooms.

The defendant was ordered discharged.

NEW YEAR ACCIDENT.

LEADS TO DAMAGE SUIT.

Albert Pelletier has a grievance and it has been all the more acute as it came in the nature of a most unwelcome New Year's gift. On the opening day of the year he had been in the Imperial and when he came out he was feeling happy and cheerful as befitted the holiday time. While in the act of crossing Spring street from the Imperial a cab belonging to the Lusk Cab Company ran into Pelletier, and he was thrown to the ground and seriously injured.

Through his attorneys, Wideman and Bentley, Pelletier has now begun suit against the Lusk Cab Company to recover $11,950. This includes the amount claimed as damages, and the expenses incurred by having two of his ribs broken, as he avers they were.

MOORE PUNISHED.

FINED FOR CONTEMPT.

A. J. Moore loomed up in Judge York's court yesterday with Attorney H. H. Appel, and tried to square himself with the court. There was no getting away from the fact that he had kidnaped his baby from the arms of its mother, at Pasadena; nor that he had threatened to raise a rough house if anyone interfered with him.

L. S. Anderson, brother of Mrs. Moore, was called to the stand by Mr. Appel, who attempted to show that he had pulled a gun on Moore when he was carrying the baby away. The witness, however, not only denied this allegation, but said that there were no firearms of any sort in the house.

Then the attorney practically confessed judgment. He said that he did not desire to call Moore to the stand, and his client could exercise his own judgment as to whether he should make a statement to the court or not. Moore was bubbling over with talk, and at once said that he did want to explain matters. Moore then began, and spoke in the most erratic way. He denied absolutely that he had said that he had an order from Judge York to take away the little one. Upon the close of the hearing Judge York held that Moore had deliberately placed himself in contempt of court, and fined him $50. The defendant left the court with a Deputy Sheriff and in a short time succeeded in getting together sufficient money to satisfy the fine. He was then released from custody.

INSURANCE COMPANY SUED.

Georgia Langley, as trustee for Mary E. Langley, is suing the Glens Falls Insurance Company to recover a balance of $650, alleged to be due on a fire loss.

In January, 1903, Mrs. Langley took out a policy of insurance with the Glens Falls Company, covering the furniture and wearing apparel, and personal effects in the house where she lived, on Hermosa avenue and Arroyo Seco Drive, at South Pasadena. On November 14 of last year the house took fire and there was a partial loss under the terms of the insurance policy amounting to, as Mrs. Langley claims, $800. The Glens Falls Company, however, have paid over $150, which complainant accepts as on account, and is now suing for the balance of $650.

FARM AND SWITCHYARD.

MRS. LEAHY OBJECTS.

Mrs. Caroline Leahy lives with her six children on the home place in the Leahy Eighth-street tract, on a nice place of about six and a half acres. It was truly rural out there, but a change has taken place very much for the worse, and Mrs. Leahy blames the Southern Pacific Company for it. She has now brought suit to enjoin the company from carrying out their plans which threaten, she avers, to make her home uninhabitable and valueless.

During the lifetime of complainant's husband the company, without asking consent, laid a single track right along the front of the Leahy place, on Alameda street, and at a later date supplemented this track with a second one. Now Mrs. Leahy says that the company has begun a series of excavations and are preparing to lay a third track for switching purposes, and that a veritable switching yard is to be established in front of the homestead. As the means of ingress and egress to her home is through a gateway on Alameda street, the destruction of the thoroughfare in this manner, she avers, threatens to make her home uninhabitable and valueless.

As it is alleged that all of this work has been carried on without any authority, and without any proceeding in condemnation having been begun, Mrs. Leahy asks that the railroad company be enjoined from carrying on work until a hearing can be had and that a perpetual injunction then issue; and that the company be compelled to restore the street to its former condition.

SCHOOL CERTIFICATES.

NEW TRUSTEES APPOINTED.

County School Superintendent Mark Keppel has appointed the following trustees: J. H. Miller, vice F. W. Clark, at Catalina; J. J. Phillips, vice C. Timmeson, at Crescenta; William Stephenson, vice Frank Stocking, at Vineland; and Albert Shelley, vice F. Correy, at Tejunga.

The Montebello school district, which lies just outside the city limits, has just voted a special tax of $960 in order to carry on the school more advantageously. An additional teacher has been engaged, too, and Miss Maud M. Winters has been appointed to the position.

The County Board of Education yesterday issued grammar-grade certificates to Misses Mabel Coulson, Eleanor V. Martin, Maud M. Winters and Josephine Hodgkins. The board also renewed the primary certificate of Miss Anna M. Miller.

THE INFERIOR COURTS.

ROHEN DIDN'T SEE LILLIAN.

GETS FIVE DAYS IN CHAIN GANG FOR THE ATTEMPT.

Beery, Bristle-chinned Rounder Makes Bold Bluff Toward Entering Foyer—Gambler Heavily Fined for Carrying Pearl-handled Revolver. Fifteen Days for Swearing.

John F. Rohen, who wanted to see Lillian Russell, will be doing five days on the chain gang, while beautiful mamma-in-law, Lillian, is speeding by rail afar off to dazzle another town.

Mister Rohen is not precisely the typical stage-door Johnny. Had Lillian seen him waiting to smile at her as she passed she would have fallen in a faint and his breath would have killed her as it emerged from his ruby, bristle-strewn lips.

After numerous and divers hot Tom and Jerrys and sundry quaffs of deadly North Main-street beer, Brother Rohen discovered that an esthetic temperment had slumbered long and yearned unnoticed within his breast.

By the time he learned this throngs of handsomely-dressed women and others were treading gingerly down First street on the way to the Grand to see sweet Lillian. He decided that he, too, would go to see Lillian. As he thought about it he became convinced that he had long loved Lillian from afar.

He made an evening toilette by scratching the foam off his whiskers and planted himself at the foyer entrance and demanded admission in the name of Love and Art.

A policeman with none of the finer sensibilities threw him into the patrol wagon. Yesterday Justice Chambers gave him a quintette of days on the chain gang.

CARRIED BIG GUN.

GAMBLER PAYS BIG FINE.

A gambler with an enormous pearl-handled revolver in his pocket, who was arrested in the tenderloin by Detective Smith, gave Justice Chambers a stony stare of defiance when brought up for arraignment yesterday. He admitted his guilt and said his name is F. B. Hickey.

"What's your business?" asked the court.

"Gamble some; used to mine a little," said Hickey laconically.

He said he was going to Pasadena with $100 in his pocket and was afraid of hold-up men.

He was fined $30 and paid it.

Seductive Stock.

John Farrell, who found a hay stack whirling gayly round in the middle of a befuddled night of boozing and craftily jumped aboard, using it for his bed, was fined $3 yesterday in the Police Court. He insisted that he was not a vagrant as he was accused. He was allowed to go on his own recognizance.

Alleged Bicycle Thief.

B. White, a tattered gentleman with a yearning for locomotion, was bound over for trial in the Superior Court yesterday under $500 bonds on a charge of stealing a bicycle from the corner of First and Spring streets. It belonged to Frank Herron.

Cursed an Officer.

Remarks reflecting on the ancestry of the copper on the Sonoratown beat cost E. Robles fifteen days of his liberty by suggestion of Justice Chambers yesterday. Robles was swearing at a man at the Belevue-avenue corner and making a finished job of it, when a policeman came along and interfered. Robles told him—oh! the things he told him! In the Police Court yesterday he received a sentence of $15 or fifteen days.

Gamblers in Court.

The poker players arrested by Capt. Auble in the recent raid, were arraigned before Justice Chambers yesterday. J. Moore was admitted to bail in the sum of $300, and A. Parker $100. They were allowed until Tuesday to plead. H. Lewis, B. H. Sears, Sam Blair and Clyde Davis were allowed to go free.

How to Educate the Boy.

Not a few fathers hurt their sons and damage the careers of those sons by picking out careers for them. Train up the boy in the way he should go, and then let him choose his own work. In the choice of a vocation, as in the choice of a wife, every young man should be left alone. If he is not worthy of being left alone the parent has grievously injured the boy in the preceding decade of his life. Those interpretations mean that I would not educate my boy under a private tutor. I would educate my boy with boys, although not entirely with boys. Boys do, however, educate boys; but a boy who is trained alone is liable to fail in adjusting himself to his membership in humanity. He is to become a brother of the common lot. He therefore should learn early how to adjust himself to his fellows. Neither would I educate my son abroad; he is an American boy. I should be glad to have him get all that is best from the private school in Lausanne or Geneva, but not for one instant would I have his ideals formed by the French master or his methods by the German. A primary note in his character should be the American, although a note more fundamental is the human. He is, as a human boy, to be trained up for service in this great interesting new life of our New World. —[Prof. Thwing, in Harper's Weekly.

FUNCTION OF THE NORMALS

Is There Need of Cult... Course Adjunct?

Educators Differ on Sever... Material Points.

President Pierce Discusses th... Question.

What normal schools are and wha... they should be is a present-day ques... among educators. For local rea... the Los Angeles institution ha... become the storm center and just how ... broaden the scope of the school, at... most students, fill up empty recitation... hours and create a normal sentiment... by topics of more than general in... terest.

Some are of the opinion that a "big ... time" will make for Los Angeles ... normal center. Others insist upon th... introduction of culture courses, whil... the more practical suggest that an i... crease of the salaries paid teache... might have a beneficent effect.

President Pierce, who has given ... fourteen of the best years of his life to ... normal work, was yesterday asked for ... an expression. He said in part:

"Whatever the normal schools are, ... they are not universities. This is ... shown by the date of their birth. Uni... versities are many centuries old; nor... mal schools only about sixty-five ... years, in this country. There must ... have been an educational need, not ... met by universities, to call into being ... the normal schools. There is such a ... need, the need for well-trained teach... ers in our elementary schools. To ... train such teachers is the peculiar ... function of the normals. The function ... of the university is to give individual... ness an opportunity for personal ... attainment in scholarship, chiefly in ... the field of letters, though of late sci... ence has received a growing share of ... consideration.

"It is plain that the respective edu... cational services rendered by the two ... institutions are quite different and ... distinct. For a long time the univer... sities held the work of the normals to ... be unnecessary. Many university men ... still hold that the art of teaching de... mands no special training, that to ... know a subject is preparation enough ... for teaching it successfully. Our State ... University worked on this plan dur... ing all the earlier years of its direc... tion of high-school work in this State, ... receiving its graduates as teachers into ... the high schools without any previous ... study of methods of instruction. But ... about twelve years ago the depart... ment of pedagogy was established at ... the urgent request of the normal-... school men of the State, and now stu... dents who aspire to the high-school ... teacher's certificate are required to ... take a course in education covering ... not less than twelve units for one year.

"The idea of competition between ... the normal schools and the university ... is manifestly absurd. Even on what ... might be called the commercial basis, ... there is no competition, no 'common ... stock for the same object.' A graduate ... from an accredited high school with ... the credentials for admission to the ... University of California can make ... choice of two distinct 'offers,' yes, ... three. If he wishes general scholar... ship and culture, he goes directly to ... the university, where he has the great... est facility to meet his needs. If he ... wishes to become a teacher, there are ... two courses open to him. The normal ... school offers a culture and profes... sional course of two years leading to ... the certificate to teach in primary ... and grammar grades at an average ... salary in this State of $77 per month. ... The University of California offers a ... three years' professional course of ... two years leading to a life certificate ... to teach in high schools, at an aver... age salary of $97 per month, with the ... added distinction of an academic de... gree. Few university graduates con... sider the privilege of teaching in the ... normal school a point worth counting, and ... there is popular preference for normal ... graduates in the work practically ... all of them out.

"Granting that the Los Angeles ... normal must be 'filled up,' and at once, ... let us look at the probability of the ... proposed plan working to this end. Un... less all of the normals adopt this plan, ... which is highly improbable, there will ... be no possibility of obtaining a State ... diploma by a course of four years from ... the ninth grade in some Normal ... school, or two years from the High ... school, while the Los Angeles school ... requires three years from the High ... school. There will result a dilemma in ... the Normal School situation; the State ... law requiring a difference of prepa... ration for a certificate of the same ... grade. Human nature would impel a ... prospective teacher to obtain her gram... mar-grade certificate by the less exact... ing way. The more ambitious will have ... the incentive to come to a school of the ... higher plan; for they would argue that ... it were better to take one year more ... at Berkeley and secure not only both ... the high school and grammar grade cer... tificates, but also the much-coveted de... gree. It would seem that only a very ... little mind can discover in such a ... course a strong influence for the fill... ing up of the Los Angeles Normal ... School.

"But what is of much more im... portance than any question of num... bers is the fact that the change would ... destroy the Normal School at Los An... geles as such, and create in its stead ... a secondary annex to the State Uni... versity. Such a subuniversity would ... necessarily be under the control of the ... board of regents, its faculty would be ... selected by the president of the uni... versity or his representative, its meth... ods would be university methods, and ... instead of coming to it would be working ... toward university degrees. Such a ... change in this in a leading educational ... center of the south is a question ... which the people of Southern California ... should have representatives in the State ... Legislature to settle. Moreover ... should this farming out university ... juniors and sophomores in a mixed ... class of kindergarten, Normal, and ... manual training school would be suf... ficiently popular among candidates for ... scholastic honors to result in filling up ... the school, only time could tell. ... But the really serious question in... volved in the proposed plan is its ... probable effect on the teaching force ... of the seven southern counties of Cali... fornia. This force numbers about two ... thousand, and is composed of three ... groups, viz: Normal graduates and ex... perienced teachers from other States, ... graduates from California Normal ... schools, and teachers who are licensed ... by examination. Four hundred new ... teachers are added to the force each ... year, only one hundred and seventy-... five of whom are graduates of the two ... Southern California Normal schools. ... The State, believing in the value of ... professional training for the teacher's ... work, has recently enacted a law for ... the purpose of restricting the numbers ... who are licensed by examination. This ... enactment has, therefore, decreased ... the now less than 20 per cent. of the ... school teachers of Southern Cali...

This ...ment has, therefore, decreased ...now less than 20 per cent. of the ...school teachers of Southern Cali...fornia obtain certificates in this way.

"At the same time the State law recognizes Normal diplomas of other States whose holders have received only the same length of training required at present in our Normal schools. The proposed change would act harmfully on our teaching force in two ways; First, it would discriminate against the teachers trained in our California schools by requiring of them a longer period of preparation than is required of their foreign competitors; and second, it would tend to decrease the supply of trained teachers and force us back to the old position where the majority of our teachers were licensed by examination. This would be a retrograde movement in public education.

"The argument that the graduates of our Normal schools are not prepared to do good work as teachers, thus making it necessary to lengthen the time of their preparation, has no foundation in fact. The many letters of commendation that I have received from county superintendents, school principals and officials, as well as from Mothers' clubs and individual citizens, may be taken as proof of the good work of our graduates in the schools and communities to which they have gone; proof, also, of the enlightenment and skill which they have carried into their work.

"Normal schools are the schools of the people, having done more to raise the standard of public education than any other influence in our commonwealth. Their students are drawn from the people and return their services directly to the people. To interfere in any way with this nearness of association and sympathy would be an injustice to the people whose taxes support these schools."

THE OIL INDUSTRY.

LOCAL STOCKS AT LOW EBB.

TRANSPORTATION LACKING FOR COALINGA OUTPUT.

Prices Not Much Advanced Yet but Upward Movement Predicted—Santa Fe Reported to be About to Start New Developments in Fullerton Field.

Stocks of oil of the local field are reduced lower than at any time before in many months, but as yet prices have not risen materially.

While Bakersfield, Coalinga and other oil-producing districts are suffering from need of transportation facilities, local producers do not have these conditions to contend with, for the Los Angeles market readily absorbs the entire product.

Officials of the Oil Storage and Transportation Company said yesterday that they are storing only about ten thousand barrels of oil at present, where a few months ago they had about one hundred and twenty-five thousand barrels. This shows that the demand is considerably in advance of the production and those best qualified to judge are predicting higher prices in the next few months.

President Lyman Stewart of the Union Oil Company says that his company is experiencing a great deal of difficulty in getting its product shipped from the Coalinga and other fields, where it has large quantities stored. The demand in Los Angeles, however, has reduced to a considerable extent the quantity of oil stored by this company about here.

It is reported that the Santa Fé Railroad Company will soon start seven new strings of tools on its properties in the Fullerton field. While the Fullerton oil is considered too valuable for fuel purposes, it is highly probable that the company will market this product and depend upon the Bakersfield oil for its locomotives.

OFFICIALLY INVITED.

Los Angeles County Asked to Send an Exhibit to the Lewis and Clark Exposition.

An official invitation has been extended to the county of Los Angeles by the management of the Lewis and Clark Centennial Exposition, to be held in Portland, Or., in 1905, to make a special exhibit. In an accompanying communication Henry E. Reed, director of exploitation, states that it is the purpose of the exposition to encourage comprehensive exhibits by counties and by chambers of commerce, boards of trade and other commercial organizations. The preparation and installing of these exhibits will be left to the counties or organizations in whose name they are made. Space will be provided on the grounds for all buildings erected, and no charge will be made therefor. All collective exhibits will be permitted to participate in the general competition.

The director expresses confidence that the arrangement proposed will offer to all counties an exceptional opportunity of demonstrating their potentialities.

OCCIDENTAL COLLEGE NOTES.

E. C. Wright and Ralph C. Parker of Pomona College, with Dan S. Hammack and A. W. Buell for Occidental have completed the larger part of arrangements for the field day between the two colleges, which will be held in this city on March 12 or 14, the day remaining undecided.

It is arranged that the third place points will not count, and three men from each team will be allowed to enter for the sake of practice. The latter stipulation is for Pomona's benefit, as it will be the way in which they will run against Berkeley and Stanford.

President Wadsworth left yesterday for Santa Barbara, where he will preach in the Presbyterian Church, speaking also in the interests of the college.

J. S. Slemmons of Butte, Mont., is making a visit of a few weeks with his sister, Mrs. M. S. Cummins, the lady principal. He is accompanied by his wife.

William Bacon left college over three weeks ago on account of an attack of la grippe, and, although he has recovered from the effects, he will not return to his classes.

Harry Raney and R. Thompson were not debarred from participating in the U.S.C. field day, as it was reported.

The U.S.C. field day was postponed indefinitely, because of the rain, and an attempt will be made to have it in the middle of next week.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Olga Steeb.

Musical people were entertained yesterday afternoon at Blanchard Hall with a classical piano programme, well rendered by Olga Steeb. Inclement weather did not deter Olga's friends from coming, and of her large audience a large representation brought dainty floral tributes for the pretty little musician.

Thirteen years of age, Olga Steeb has piano technique and musical understanding possessed by few mature women. Her mechanical dexterity would suffice to place her on the lists of concert pianists, and had she more strength in her small hands she could successfully compete with most of them.

Herr Thilo Becker, her instructor, says that the best thing about his pupil is her desire and constant willingness to do faithful, painstaking work. Work in getting musical technique means the dullest sort of drudgery, too—drudgery that most girls are quite unwilling to endure.

She shows her common sense in her concerts. No freak product of mental precocity and human hothouses is Olga Steeb—just a sturdy, rosy-cheeked little girl who looks is if all of her time were spent in romps, and she possesses a deferential air of sweet modesty that is quite winning.

Her playing shows most unusual development for one so young, and translates into tone with rare accuracy the evident thought of the masters who penned the compositions. Florid passages she does with twinkling little cascades of shimmering notes, or crisp and brilliant phrases of rich beauty. Heavy runs in the bass are plainly lacking in power, but are nearly perfect in digital dexterity. She plays with tempo in proper relation to the selection, has command of a smooth and even retard and accelerando, and knows that there is a difference between forte and fortissimo. Her tone shading is excellent.

Olga Steeb is no wonder child, and it is a good thing, for the forced prodigy has exhausted the delicate sparks of artistic fire long before he or she has arrived at maturity. It is another good thing that she has a capacity and liking for work, for this, with her sound health and sound mind, with very evident musical temperament, may make her some day a preëminent artist.

Yesterday afternoon's programme included these selections from various composers: Haydn, Variation in F minor.

Bach, Prelude and Fugue in B Flat; Sarabande and Passepied in E minor, from English suites; Fugue in C Sharp.

Beethoven: Bagatelles: Op. 119, No. 4; Op. 33, No. 5; Op. 119, No. 11; Op. 33, No. 7; Variations, Op. 76.

Schubert, Minuet from Op. 78; Impromptu, Op. 142, No. 2; Moment musical, No. 5.

Weber, "Invitation to the Dance."

Schumann, "Child Falling Asleep." "Bird as Prophet." "Reiterstueck." "Op I, Variations."

Mozart, Concerto in D; second piano, Thilo Becker.

MODERN ELOQUENCE

HOW TO TALK, WHEN TO TALK AND JUST WHAT TO SAY.

One of the Most Popular Literary Productions of the Day.

Almost every man and a great many women at some time in his or her life, is called upon to say something before a popular assemblage. It is surprising how difficult it is to express one's thoughts attractively, not to say with force, before any miscellaneous audience. A man may be intelligent, he may write well, and yet, when he is called on for a short speech on some commonplace topic at any gathering, he may entertain something stronger than a longing to be permitted to sit down gracefully before he is fairly on his feet.

The art of public speaking is found largely in the ability to speak well without making any apparent effort to be impressive. The interesting talker, either in ordinary conversation or in public utterance, is the man or woman who talks without making too great a display of the emotion. If a man before any public body will talk in the same way that he converses with his friends, his speech will always command popular recognition. The hardest lesson for any man to learn is the one of simplicity in statement. To talk well is to talk simple and plainly, and, paradoxical as it may seem, the man of scholarly attainments who is effective as a public speaker is the man who has learned the lesson, and a hard lesson it is, of talking effectively without making any show of pedantry.

One of the greatest public speakers of the century was the Hon. Thomas B. Reed, editor-in-chief of "Modern Eloquence," now being distributed by The Times. Mr. Reed devoted practically his entire time to the work of supervising and editing this standard publication, with the view of presenting to the people a collection of all public orations of merit extant. "Modern Eloquence" tells people how to talk, when to talk, and what to say if called upon to make a public address on any occasion. As a literary production this publication has commanded the best recognition of educated people everywhere. While its subject matter is "heady" in the sense that it satisfies the demands of the scholar, yet the matter is written in a vein that appeals to popularity in all cases where there is a demand for standard literature of the best merit.

What lends to "Modern Eloquence" one of its greatest and most lasting values to the world is the fact that its editors have obtained for exclusive publication lectures, addresses and speeches, hitherto unpublished, as they were actually delivered. Many have been extant only in the unsatisfactory form of meager newspaper reports, but here the original form of the speech appears in its accurate entirety. Powerful speeches caught from the air by the reporter have been edited by the authors themselves. From the hitherto inaccessible, a score of modern classics have been added to the storehouse of our Anglo-Saxon tongue. As Senator Mason said of "Modern Eloquence:" "I know of no other set of books which covers so vast a scope of forensic literature. It duplicates not a single volume in my library."

In connection with the above, The Times desires again to impress upon its readers the importance of acting promptly if they desire to secure advantage of the remarkable opportunity in the matter of price and terms afforded by The Times's special offer.

If for any reason you are in doubt as to the desirability of making this great library a permanent addition to your home, cut out and send in today the coupon attached to announcement on another page of this paper. This will bring you, without cost, a large, handsome portfolio, together with full information regarding the special offer.

$5.00 Black Silk Underskirts $3.95.

Absolutely Necessary with Most Spring Suits.

Nearly all the correct styles in Spring suits are made of thin materials of a loose, open weave which require a silk underskirt.

Knowing this we had our buyer make a special effort to secure a quantity of black silk skirts which we could provide for our patrons at a saving price.

But black silk was going up. Manufacturers did not want to part with it. Black silk underskirts were, indeed, hard to find. However, we secured a small lot of 75 silk skirts as a special courtesy from one of the factories from which we buy immense quantities of the goods.

These are made of beautiful black taffeta with accordian pleated flounce, gored full, dust ruffle and flounce trimmed with narrow ruffle on bottom. All sizes and lengths.

The very best $5.00 silk skirts on the market. Monday only $3.95.

DEATH COMES IN DIREFUL FORMS.

MANY FATALITIES OCCUR IN THE BISBEE MINES.

Receiver of International Bank of Nogales Reports a Very Bad Condition of Affairs—Sheriff Sued for Abduction—Zeckendorf Partnership Litigation.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF THE TIMES.]

TUCSON (Ariz.) Feb. 25.—From Bisbee are coming many tales of mining accidents. In one day W. P. McCall was killed in the Wolverine and Arizona mine, and John Tramain in the Holbrook shaft. McCall fell ninety feet, stepping carelessly into an open trap of which he had been warned. Tramain was crushed to death in a cave-in in the bottom of a shaft and it was several hours before his body could be reached. Saturday night Frank Hollister and Otto Molander were killed and Dominick Brunas terribly burned by an accident which took place at the bottom of the Pittsburg and Duluth shaft. Hollister had been preparing a giant-powder cartridge, to put into a hole that had just been drilled. After a fashion common to miners, he was using the sharp point of his candlestick to poke a fuse hole in the cartridge. He allowed the flame of the candle to come too near the stick of powder, which ignited and burned fiercely. He threw the stick from him, but unhappily into two open boxes of dynamite. The dynamite did not explode, but blazed up furiously, filling the shaft with flame and gas. Hollister started to climb the rope, but was overcome by the gas and fell. His head struck the edge of the ore bucket, splitting the skull and killing him instantly. Molander managed to climb a few feet and he and Brunas were brought to the surface in the bucket. John Fors, a Finnish miner, at the risk of his life, went down in the bucket to the bottom of the deadly hole and brought up the body of Hollister. For three hours after the accident smoke poured from the mouth of the shaft in a thick volume, but little damage was done the mine by the fire.

Joseph McDonald died at Douglas a few days ago from the effects of injuries received at the Calumet smelter. He was crushed under a dropping ore cage.

Abraham Powers was killed lately in the power-house of the Greene Consolidated Copper Company at Cananea, through the breaking of a plank on which he was working, twenty feet from the ground.

AFFAIRS REPORTED TANGLED.

Receiver Fred Herrera of the International Bank of Nogales has made a preliminary report to the District Court. He has found the books and accounts of the bank in very bad shape. In the safe were $40.75 American money, and $396.67 Mexican. The bank had loaned the Arizona Commercial Company amounts aggregating $13,500 on unsecured notes, the concern being overdrawn on its running account to the amount of $53,878. The International Trust Company had a note in the vault for $2500, and had overdrawn $34,410, Mexican. These figures are interesting from the fact that President John Dessart of the International Bank is president of the Arizona Commercial Company, and L. F. Swain, the bank's cashier, is secretary, and the officers and sole stockholders of the International Trust Company are R. Allyn Lewis, president; L. H. Rhuart, secretary, and John Dessart, treasurer. Interesting also in the list of overdrafts are three of L. F. Swain for $2944, $15,953, and $21,423, respectively. W. J. N. McCurdy, placed in jail in Mexico a number of months ago for an assault upon Willis P. Harlow, has an overdraft of $10,918. The Nogales Copper Company overdrew $6644. The total deposits, as found by the receiver, were $24,867, American, and $146,545, Mexican. The largest Mexican depositors were the Banco Minero, $86,424, and P. Sandoval & Co., $14,975. Over $30,000 is owing to the Bank of Commerce, New York. R. Allyn Lewis, vice-president of the International Bank, is credited on its books with a certificate of deposit for $5000. The Sandoval account was for exchange, purchased only a few days prior to the closing of the bank.

The United States Attorney for Arizona has entered suit at Tombstone against the Detroit Copper Mining Company for $20,257; the Arizona Copper Company for $7701, and Ira Hooper of Clifton for $45,461, amounts alleged to be due the government for wood unlawfully cut by defendants on the Black Mesa forest reserve. The suit is not dissimilar to that of the government, a few years ago, against the Copper Queen Company.

ZECKENDORF LITIGATION.

Albert Steinfeld, resident partner of the firm of L. Zeckendorf & Co., has gained a victory in the suit of L. Zeckendorf for the appointment of a receiver for the firm. Judge Davis, in the District Court, decided that he hesitated "to take from the lawful owners the management, control and liquidation of this great business and subject it to the large expense, destruction of good will and inevitable waste incident to receivership." The Zeckendorf establishment is understood to carry on the largest merchandizing business in the Southwest. The quarrel between the partners was over a division of profits in connection with the sale of the Silver Bell copper mines. Among the attorneys for Zeckendorf was E. A. Meserve of Los Angeles.

Joseph Hughes, arrested in Bisbee last fall on a charge of cattle stealing in Texas and abducted out of Arizona by Sheriff Denman of Brown county, Tex., has been acquitted in the Texas courts. Hughes has returned to Bisbee and has begun suit against Sheriff Denman, claiming $15,000 damages because of his abduction.

Joseph Navarro of Douglas has made complaint charging J. W. Johnson with the murder of the former's brother, Humphrey Navarro. Navarro was killed in Naco February 4, presumably on the Mexican side of the international line. The testimony of Dora West, a witness, is that the fatal shot was fired by Johnson, who appears to have been left to go unmolested. Complainant alleges that his brother was robbed of several hundred dollars won at gambling. According to his story, Johnson is one of the toughest characters in Arizona and is the same man who lately placed the body of a drunken miner on the railroad track at Naco, to be run over by a passing railroad train.

JUSTIFIABLE KILLING.

A Chinaman named Ling Sun was killed at Morenci Thursday by a countryman, James Mammon, owner of the Longfellow restaurant, the Detroit company's boarding-house in that camp. Mammon has been discharged from custody, evidence before the Coroner's jury showing that Sun had threatened to kill him and had even purchased a revolver and cartridges for the purpose. Mammon was warped by the clerk who sold the revolver and was ready for his would-be assassin upon his appearance.

The Pima County Board of Supervisors is urging the adoption of a bill lately introduced in Congress by Delegate Wilson, which seeks to liberate the county from the payment of the Tucson and Globe narrow-gauge bonds, amounting to $318,275, 9 per cent. of the county's total property valuation.

Mary E. Smith has filed suit for divorce against B. A. Smith. The couple were married in Los Angeles in 1878 and lived together until 1857. Desertion is charged.

Charles McNeal, on expiration of a sentence at the Folsom prison, has been returned to Yuma to serve out an unexpired sentence in the Territorial penitentiary. He escaped from a convict camp at Yuma over four years ago, went to Sacramento, Cal., committed burglary, was caught and sentenced to a three years' term.

The El Paso and Southwestern Railroad Company has started upon the erection of the $20,000 depot at Bisbee, on the former site of the company's roundhouse.

Bisbee Odd Fellows will erect a $40,-000 building for business and lodge uses.

SOON TO CLASH NEAR ANJU.

Russian Infantry and Artillery Have Reached that Place and Early Engagement is Expected.

Japan Assumes Protectorate Over Korea and Guarantees Independence and Territorial Integrity of Country—Japs Mystify Russians.

[BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS—P.M.]

SEOUL, Saturday, 5:50 p.m. (Eastern Time).—[Exclusive Dispatch]. The vicinity of Ping Yang or Anju will probably be the scene of the first engagement shortly. A large body of Russians with fifty-four guns has reached Anju, sixty miles north of Ping Yang. Other detachments of Russian soldiers are at various places between Anju and the Yalu River. The force, probably totaling 5000 men, has now crossed into Northern Korea. The telegraph lines from Ping Yang to the north have been suddenly interrupted, indicating the presence of Russian scouts.

MOVEMENT OF RUSSIAN LAND FORCES.

[BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS—P.M.]

MOSCOW, Feb. 27.—[By Atlantic Cable.] According to the latest information in high military circles Russian infantry has occupied the road between Liao Yang, on the road from Mukden to Port Arthur and the Yalu river, its front and flanks being strongly supported. The right flank is at the Akushan and the left near the town of Wiju.

The Russian cavalry crossed the Yalu between Yongampho and Antung and occupied the road toward Sukohon and Cossack scouts advanced along the greater and lesser caravan routes. Scouts are now ten miles east of Phyeng-Yang. The cavalry is 355 miles north and the infantry 125 miles northwest of Phyeng-Yang.

EXPECT CONTINUAL BOMBARDMENT.

[BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS—P.M.]

TOKIO, Feb. 27.—[By Asiatic Cable.] It is understood that Admiral Togo's main fleet is still in the vicinity of Port Arthur and it is expected that his fleet will continue bombarding the place until it is untenable and the Russian fleet is destroyed.

TOLSTOI SHOWS PATRIOTISM.

[BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS—P.M.]

ST. PETERSBURG, Feb. 27.—[By Atlantic Cable.] Count Leo Tolstoi has contributed a thousand sets of his works, the profit from the sale of which is to be expended for the benefit of the troops taking part in the campaign in the Far East.

WIJU OPENED TO FOREIGN TRADE.

[BY DIRECT WIRE TO THE TIMES.]

SEOUL, Saturday, Feb. 27.—[Exclusive Dispatch.] The Korean Foreign Office officials announce the opening of Wiju to foreign trade. The issue of Japanese war currency has received official sanction. The Emperor of Korea notes that this currency is redeemed locally at 89 cents in gold, a yen. The last Russophile official in the Korean cabinet has been removed and Japan's supporters remain.

CANNOT GUESS JAPS' INTENTIONS.

[BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS—A.M.]

ST. PETERSBURG, Feb. 27.—[By Atlantic Cable.] The desperate manner in which the Japanese are returning to the attack at Port Arthur in spite of their repeated repulses has convinced the military authorities that their main objective for the present is to hopelessly cripple the Russian fleet, in order to secure absolute freedom in the disembarkation of troops. For this reason the Russian commander is carefully guarding against exposing his ships, keeping them in the harbor, under the guns of the fortifications.

A doubt exists as to whether the Japanese really design to land near Port Arthur and invest the city. The authorities admit that they are considerably mystified, but the prevailing opinion seems to be that the Japanese will not hazard a landing at this stage of the campaign. It is pointed out that owing to the conformation of the shores, the only suitable landing places near Port Arthur are well within the range of the batteries, and that if a landing is attempted on the northern part of the peninsula, the Japanese transports will be unable to come to land, and that on account of the shelving shore the troops would have to march miles through mud and low water, exposed to a galling off-shore fire.

No news is being received here concerning the operations around Vladivostok, whence under the Viceroy's orders, the telegrams are forbidden except from officers to their families, and then only with the approval of the military censor.

The exact whereabouts of the Russian Vladivostok squadron is not known, but it is presumed to be in the harbor.

JAPAN ASSUMES PROTECTORATE.

[BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS—A.M.]

TOKIO, Feb 27. (Delayed in transmission.)—[By Asiatic Cable.] Japan has assumed a protectorate over Korea in an important protocol which was signed at Seoul, on Tuesday by Mr. Hayashi, the Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Majesty of Japan, acting in behalf of the Japanese government, in which it is specifically stipulated that Japan respects Korea's territorial integrity, the sovereignty of the King and the independence of the country. Korea on its part agrees to follow the advice of Japan internally and abroad and to permit the Japanese military occupation for the purpose of preserving order and insuring the protection and independence of the country. Korea also agrees to refrain from making agreements with other powers in violation of the terms of the protocol, the signing of which guarantees the territorial integrity of Korea.
